Farewell, dear heart! Since needs it must I go,
Dear heart, farewell!

A SLEEPY GODDESS

A Theatrical Ditty Goes to Sleep on the Spectacular Stage.
[Leander Richardson in Detroit Times.]
In a scene of "Orpheus and Eurydice," a burlesque contemtable to listen to but bewitching to look at, a large party of gods and goddesses are disclosed asleep on Mount Olympus high.

How Flies Ate an Iceberg and Liberated a Vessel.
[Philadelphia Press.]
"Don't think I ever mentioned it, did I?" said the nautical cop. "Let me see—I think it was in the fall of 1865. Our vessel was ice-bound on the coast of Siberia, and off to leeward, and about 300 yards was an iceberg about thirty feet high. It was just about noon-time, and the sun was shining brightly. I had taken my truck at the wheel, and was lying in the fo'c'st'le, when the mate came running forrard and woks me up. 'Turn out, you lubber,' said he, 'if you want to see the greatest thing you ever saw in your life. There is a big cloud of ice-floes coming down from the north, and we'll be sure to get out here inside the next hour.' I hadn't the least idea what the mate meant, but I obeyed orders, and scrambled up on deck.

Etching on Fungi.
[Milwaukee Wisconsin.]
A decided novelty in the art line has been placed on exhibition at the Woman's Industrial exchange, a series of etchings on fungi in the great northern woods. It presents a surface of a delicate cream-like tint, underlying which is a rich brown. By deftly and artistically removing this surface with a sharp-pointed instrument the bronze is exposed in beautiful contrast to the natural surface, and can be wrought into almost any effect by one acquainted with the work. The series on exhibition at the Woman's exchange were made by Mrs. Beatrice Wilson, an artist of Florence, Wis. They are pretty novelties and combine artistic merit and oddity. One scene, a group of deer, and another, depicting a castle in the distance and a terrace approach, are especially worthy of notice and are attracting a good deal of attention among the lovers of unique art.

How to Injure the Chances.
[Arkansas Traveler.]
Political Canon—"Let's see, colonial, how can we injure the chances of the general? He isn't exact, of our stripe and we must down him." "Yes, I know. Say, I have it. Let us publish a newspaper article declaring that he is vicious and that age has not affected him." "But that is a fact, for he is vigorous." "Makes no difference. The public would regard the statement as a lie, and will take up the idea that his friends are trying to bolster him up. Don't you see?"

An Editor's Reasonable Doubt.
[Vineyard (Mo.) Gazette.]
A lady writes asking us to discontinue sending the copy of this paper heretofore forwarded to her husband's address, as he had recently "left this world for a happier country." As the late lamented owed us for three years' subscription, which he steadily declined to pay, "though often requested," we may be pardoned for doubting, even from our standpoint, whether he went directly to the New Jerusalem.

A Strange Scent.
[Chicago Herald.]
A new religious sect in Boston holds that disease is caused by the absence of God from the body, and that it can be cured by the passage of the divine effluence from the well to the sick as they sit with their spines in contact. It is said to number among its votaries people of influence and prominence, and some whose names are as familiar as household words.

Unearthing the Hoard-Builders.
[Exchange.]
In the suburbs of Houston, Tex., is a large mound, which until recently had never been explored. Upon examination, a few days ago, a party of explorers found a large number of skeletons, Indian relics, etc. The skeletons were found in all sorts of postures, some sitting, some standing, some lying down, and others leaning against the walls.

NEW YORK'S MASHERS.

A Few Distinctive Types Selected from a Limitless Variety.

The Broken-Down but Self-Placed Dude—The Bold and Dangerous, the Reprobate and the Romantic.

["Durandal" in Cincinnati Enquirer.]
The variety in New York mashers is limitless. In London the term "masher" is distinctive of one particular type. The London masher is a magnificent creature who wears half a dozen suits a day, frequents the green-room of the theatres given up to comic opera and burlesque at night, patronizes the music halls, and drives his own horses in the park. He is dissipated to the last degree, and an inveterate man-about-town. The London masher is magnificent. He devotes all his time with the girls, and goes to pieces with extraordinary rapidity. New York cannot boast of a class of mashers of this sort. In all the city, however, there are not more than three men who are at all like the London plunger. These three, however, go far to make up in wild living for their poverty in morning. They keep the town talking from morning to night, and their freaks and escapades are a source of incessant amusement to their cronies.

After all, the youth who undertakes to mimic the London masher must suffer accordingly. He must, in the first place, give up all pretensions to decent society, for mothers here do not overlook wild living in young men as they do in London. The ambitious boy who starts in to sow his wild oats in this prodigal manner must therefore forfeit all recognition from respectable women, be scowled at by fathers of families and generally shunned. The life is likely to pull him down rapidly, and in the end make him prematurely old. Whether it pays or not is an open question; everybody says it doesn't. But if it doesn't, why are there those who follow it!

THE BROKEN-DOWN SWELL.

Another type of masher, and one who is very prevalent in New York, is the broken-down dude or swell. He may be seen everywhere, from the Battery to Harlem river. He is always abroad, and hence one must conclude that he has no home. He lives in the street-cars, the stages and hotel corridors, elevated railroad stations and the sidewalk in front of the great dry-goods houses are his special haunts. I saw a typical specimen of this class in the Sixth Avenue Elevated Railroad car this morning when I came down town. There was a drizzling rain, and the mud was half a foot deep, while the wind blew fitfully. When the train stopped at Fourteenth street the masher drifted in. I should imagine from his appearance that he had been standing in front of Macy's all night long. He wore a standing collar, which was very much broken down at the sides, and a white satin tie, which had evidently been rained upon several hours. His well-worn English beaver hat was dented and disreputable-looking, and his brick-colored gloves were all out at the fingers. His spare form was clad in a bob tailed coat which had once been a stylish drab, but had become a mottled gray, and a pair of light brown trousers were rolled up at the bottom, exposing a pair of pointed patent-leather boots, cracked on either side. He carried a cane with an enormous silver head, and wore a haughty and reserved expression. He evidently hadn't been shaved for two days, and his eyes were un-bugged up, but his self-complacency was undisturbed and he was apparently as satisfied and contented with himself as it was possible for him to be.

The man's appearance was absolutely grotesque. It would have been pitiful if he were not so well satisfied with himself. He pulled a ruffled 1-cent morning paper out of his pocket, and read it placidly until he came to Park place. The well-dressed and prosperous-looking men on their way to business looked at the masher askance, or openly made fun of him, as he pranced through the car and alighted at the station. He skipped rapidly down the stairs and went off toward Broadway with his arms akimbo, his hat on one side of his head, and his cane swinging jauntily in the air. Meanwhile the rain poured down on him, the wind blew at him and the mud splashed all over him, but his self-satisfied air did not desert him for an instant, and he seemed utterly unconscious of the gibes of the street boys or the paternal advice of the passing truck-drivers. Does anybody know why he didn't carry an umbrella? Because this weather reminded him of "Dear ole Lannon." The dude masher, however, is rapidly drifting out of favor. Even the Bowery girls refuse to notice him now, and he spends his time in dreaming of his conquests of a year ago, when he enjoyed a short-lived popularity.

THE REALLY DANGEROUS.

Still another type of the men who are known as mashers is the rejuvenated "sport" of other days. He has lately appeared on upper Broadway in considerable numbers. Formerly he confined himself to the lower wards of the city or to Grand street and Third avenue. Gradually he crept up into Sixth avenue, and now he may be seen on Broadway. I presume eventually he will stride into Fifth avenue. Among his intimates he is known as one who "travels on his stupe." As a rule he is square-shouldered and athletic in build. He wears a high hat, big amethyst rings, and usually he has a huge mustache curled at the ends, oils his hair and smokes strong cigars. It is a popular impression among his kind that women love him at first sight, and husbands and fathers are afraid of him because of his powerful proportions. This is a particularly aggravating type. He accosts women on the street boldly, insults them in cars and stages, and makes their afternoon walks a source of annoyance and terror. He is persistent and fearless. If a woman gives him the slightest encouragement he will follow her for hours about town, dog her footsteps to the door of her own home, and wait for her day after day. He is by all odds the most dangerous of the many different sorts of mashers in New York.

THE OLD REPROBATE.

A type which is growing alarmingly numerous is composed of mashers who have passed 60 years of age. These are the most soulless, iniquitous and abandoned mashers of them all. They are usually rather fine-looking old men, scrupulously neat and fashionably attired. They all tend toward one style of dress, and a description of one describes them all. He wears a blue or black frock coat, buttoned high in the neck, a white collar, a bit of scarlet tie, light trousers, white over-gaiters, and patent leather boots. He is always well gloved, and carries a respectable-looking cane. He shaves every day, and his white mustache is carefully waxed. If he has any hair it is parted behind. This gentleman is always round-shouldered, always weak in the back, and always has a mincing gait. He leans into the faces of young girls as he makes his way along the more populous streets, and smiles continually. Every able-bodied man who comes along fairly catches with a desire to seize this particular style of ruffian by the neck and toss him into the street. He seems happy and contented. He is never seen at night, and does not venture forth unless the day is clear. Warm, sunshiny days bring out hordes of these vampires. Damp weather gives them the rheumatism and lumbago, and they are obliged to stay at home and nurse their pains.

THE ROMANTIC SNEAK.

There is one other type that should not pass unnoticed. It is the romantic masher, who wears his hair long and effects stained-glass attitudes, a weak voice, a sad smile and gentle manners. Not infrequently he is a dry-goods clerk, and his only home is in a cheap boarding-house, but he talks with a weird and romantic intonation and raves over the more fleshly poets. He is, as a rule, a man of small intelligence, but extraordinary conceit. He wanders pensively along the avenues in the afternoon, gazing soulfully at women. His hands are clasped behind his back. He wears a soft felt hat and clinging frock coat. He not infrequently attends Sunday-school, and he always has the confidence of the mothers. He seems pure and good. Look out for him. He is a sneak, and in some respects the most dangerous of his breed.

NOVEL CORNET PLAYING.

An Indiana Lad's Wall-Paper Imitation of Levy and His Music.

[Chicago Times.]
Arias from "Il Trovatore" and "Bohemia," rendered with the precision and perfectness of a cornet on a simple piece of wall-paper rolled in the shape of a cornucopia are not often heard, yet yesterday afternoon, at the Tremont house, two dozen men stood amazed and enchanted listening to such music. The performer was a boy about 14 years old. His instrument was a home-made or rather self-made affair. It consisted of a square of wall-paper rolled in a circumscripted circle at one end, and branching out towards the terminus was about six or eight times greater than the mouthpiece. The boy stood at the door with the crude instrument in his mouth with his left hand, while with his right he beat a species of bass on the panel of the portal. He had the peculiar power of so sounding the panel that it gave forth chords almost exactly imitative of a bass-viol, which chimed in with the wall-paper music rhythmically and musically. The wall-paper cornet itself was as good as a counterfeit of a brass and silver instrument as anything not brass and silver could be. It was really quite a wonderful performance, and the youth showed that he possessed a musical talent high above the usual order. When he had finished his renditions he doffed his cap and went around among the crowd of men whom he had attracted by his novel melody. A shower of coins indicated the men's appreciation of the performance, and the boy left the hotel with a couple of dollars. He has been in Chicago four days, and he says his name is Irving Ritter and he resides in North Manchester, Ind.

He came to Chicago without money and only his musical novelty to earn his bread. He went about the streets on the first day of his arrival here, playing his wall-paper instrument, and was gathering in a multitude of nickels, when a patent button-faster peddler discovered him. That worthy, who, to attract attention to his wares, goes about the streets covered with a thousand different styles of buttons sewed to his coat, vest, pants and hat in fantastic shapes, thought he saw in the boy a better card than his manifold buttons. He therefore entered into partnership with him, and now the boy plays his paper instrument on the streets, while the button-faster vender disposes of his patent to the crowd which the prodigy attracts. The boy is a musical prodigy, and it is likely that he will be engaged by some showman or other before long. As to how he makes his novel music the youth is reticent, but he shows that he has nothing in his mouth, and the music is made by the paper alone. He discovered that paper folded in a certain way made music of a cornet's volume and fineness, and he practiced on it until he has now arrived at very near perfection.

Criticism of Our Schools.

[The Current.]
The English commissioner, sent to the United States to inquire into our educational system, reports that our high schools and colleges tend rather to unfit pupils for the active duties of American life. The accuracy of this conclusion cannot be successfully disputed. There is an immense demand, yearly becoming stronger, that the governing boards of the educational institutions of the land shall take steps to re-adapt them to the needs of the present age.

Sold His Medals.

"An officer tells me," says Labouchere in The London Truth, "that when a private in his corps was tried the other day for selling his medals, and was asked by the president of the court-martial what excuse he had to make for such a disgraceful proceeding, the man answered: 'Disgrace, sir! I have grown to think the medals almost a disgrace, having been chaffed so much by my friends about my picnic to Egypt. I was tired of the subject, and, as I supposed the medals were my own, I sold them for half a crown.'"

A Wicked, Wicked Thief.

A servant girl in New Haven stole her mistress' false teeth. The woman told a policeman that "She sheesh cosh shewshy shollars, ensh she shwosh wosh shusha wresh ashdo aitesh fawsh sheesh—"

Sewing-Machine Motor.

[San Francisco Chronicle.]
An ingenious English manufacturer has, by a simple and workable invention of coiled springs, succeeded in dispensing with the need of driving sewing machines by hand or foot. A few turns of a handle wind up sufficient power to keep a machine going at full speed over an hour. It is completely under control as to the rate of stitching and stopping, and can be applied to any existing machine at moderate cost.

Georgia's Water Power.

[Exchange.]
Experts say that Broad river, at Anthony shoals, Ga., has a volume of 19,000,000 cubic feet of water per minute and its velocity is 175 feet per minute, its fall in a mile and a quarter being ninety-two feet. The horse power is calculated to be 37,500, while Lowell, the finest developed water-power in the United States, has only 16,000 horse power.

Undoubtedly.

[New York Commercial Advertiser.]
"Can brutes talk?" was the question under debate. "I should say they could—my husband talks," was the answer given by a Flat-bush woman who owns no plush or fur mantle.
