Rouen Duck

We are asked to describe the Rouen duck. This duck takes its name from the city of Rouen, in France, where it is bred largely: Epicures pronounce its meat first-class, and Baccalaureate Sermon-June 15th; Rev G like the Aylesbury, it is a prolific layer of large eggs. Its color is much like the wild tionment Mallard duck, from which this breed descends, Dist. and the drake especially is very showy and beautiful. The female is of a splashed dark brown and black, even and regular in form of the feathering. The drake's head and neck 5 is a beautiful green, with a white ring around Reunion of the Literary Societies-7:30 | it at the base. The breast is a rich brown, and the rest of the body plumage similar to the 9 plumage of the wild Mallard.

It is a heavy, waddling, sleepy kind of fowl 12 and puts on flesh and fat quickly. They are 13 very hardy, however, and the common duck of 15 the country everywhere show the markings of 16 this fowls, with which it has been extensively 17 crossed. They lay steadily from the beginning 19 sometimes laying 50 to 70 eggs without missing | 20 a single day, then laying every other day, perhaps, for months longer. They are good sitters, but hens are better to set the eggs under, 24 they are so heavy and clumsy. Mr. H. C. Perkins of Eugene City, Oregon, is breeding Rouen duck with great success.
