Love at First Sight.
[Cor. New Orleans Times-Democrat.]
"While speaking of romance and beauty, I have an authentic account of how a noted Louisville belle first met her husband, which sounds more like fiction than matter of fact. About thirty-five years ago the landing of a steambot carrying passengers was considered a social event of some importance, not only because this was the chief mode of travel where navigation made it possible, but because the superb boats that then plied up and down the Mississippi were floating palaces and carried on board constantly the most brilliant crowds of society people.

The time spent on the water was passed in dancing, feasting and flirting, and on the occasion of which I am speaking an unusually gay and distinguished party were on their way to St. Louis. The party included some of the most famous beaux of the day, and the belle of the trip was a well-known Louisville beauty. It seems that the Louisville girl reached her destination fancy free. For, as the boat drew up to the landing and the crowd on shore surged down to the water's edge to secure a glimpse of the new-comers, who was leaning over the guard, became absorbed in watching the movements of a gentleman by the gangway. He was tall and elegantly looking and strikingly handsome. Miss — did not know his name, nor if he were benedict or kachelor, but conviction suddenly seized her, and, turning to a companion, she said impressively: "There (pointing out the gentleman in question) stands the man whom I will marry." In an incredibly short period of time she did marry him; but the cream of the story lies in the fact that he had made a precisely similar remark in regard to her on first beholding the fair Louisville as she stood, surrounded by her admirers, on the steamer.

Military Dueling in Austria.
[London Times.]
A warm discussion is going on in Vienna newspapers in connection with the case of an officer recently dismissed from the army for refusing to fight a duel. Two young men named Hintner and Morl, both lieutenants in the reserves, and both attending lecture in the University of Graz, met last October at a railway station. Morl made use of some offensive expression, which Hintner thought was intended for himself. He asked Morl if it was so, adding that if it was, or if the expression was repeated, he would box his ears. Morl said it was intended for another person, and the incident ended. Four weeks later Morl sent his seconds to Hintner, calling on him for a written apology and withdrawal of the words, otherwise challenging him to fight a duel. Hintner refused to withdraw his words; he also "refused absolutely to fight a duel, because it was against his religion, against reason and conscience, and also dueling was forbidden both by the civil and the military law." Hereupon the matter was brought before a court of honor, consisting of superior officers of the Fourteenth Army corps. The decision of this court was "approved" and published on the Jan. 12, and simply recites that "Josef Hintner, Lieutenant in the Reserve of the Tyrolean Jager regiment of the Emperor Franz-Josef" is charged with "absolute refusal of a duel, and the sentence is that the accused be deprived of his commission and rank." This sentence, it appears, becomes forthwith operative.

Don't Want Any.
[Detroit Free Press.]
A colored man who had a slight acquaintance with one of the stall-keepers at the Central market hung around for half an hour the other day before saying: "See yere, boss, I wants to ax ye a queshun or two."
"All right."
"I kin git my household furnicher insured for $400."
"Yes."
"An' it won't cost but $3."
"Well."
"Wall, 'spose I had dat furnicher insured an' de house should catch fire an' eberything burn up?"
"In that case, my colored brother, you'd be jerked into jail so quick that your head wouldn't have time to swim, and from the jail you'd go to state prison for at least ten years."
"What fur?"
"Why, for setting the fire."
"Am dat possible? Wall, Ize werry much obleaged to yer, an' Ize made up my mind to save de $3 an' let de $400 go."

THE MYSTERY CLEARED UP.

[Chicago Herald.]
Many visitors to Statuary hall, in the capitol, at Washington, have noticed that in the statue of Washington, contributed by Virginia, both the upper and the lower lips bulge out into undue prominence and give the expression a rather curious cast. A native Virginian, while in Washington the other day, cleared up the mystery as follows: "I don't believe that it has ever been in print before, but the real reason why these features are distorted is that a short time before his death Washington used a double set of false teeth. They were made in Paris on gold plates, but they did not fit him. As a consequence, when he died they were in his mouth, and as I said, they bulged the lips out. The plaster cast faithfully reproduced this distortion."

Ole Bull's Daughter.

[St. Paul Pioneer Press.]
Ole Bull's only offspring likely to perpetuate his talent is his little daughter Olea, by his second wife, who was Miss Thorpe, a belle of Madison, Wis. A son of the same union died in infancy. The little flaxen-haired girl is now 8 years old, and beginning to show some of her father's talent in the use of the violin. Her father's instrument is kept sacredly awaiting the years when she may be worthy of it.

English as She Is Spoken.

"Don't give it away, please, Mildred," said Amy to the high-school girl, after reciting an escapade in which she had been engaged.
"No," replied Mildred, "I'll make no gratuitous presentation of it."

Albert McCra and James Nevils met in the neighborhood of Union Church, Jefferson county, Miss., and, both parties being armed with double-barreled shotguns, began firing at each other. After Nevils' gun was empty he shot McCra three times in the head with a pistol, from the effects of which he died in about two hours. Nevils was unharmed.

Wm. Hancock and his eldest son, who had hitherto quarreled over some business matters, met in the road near Lafayette, Ala. Both leveled their guns together, and the parent was killed instantly. The younger son seized the father's gun and fired at the brother, inflicting a slight wound. The parried then drew a revolver and mortally wounded his younger brother.

This collection comprises forty medals, in white metal, brass and bronze, each illustrating some incidents in the military and political life of General Grant.

THE AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHY CRAZE

It Brings About a Divorce Through "Holding the Mirror Up to Nature."

Young America, ever on the qui vive for crazes, is once again rattled from apex to foundation by the national enthusiasm, photography. Some of you gay amateurs are laying up cart loads of trouble, distress, and disaster.

For instance, during your joyous peregrinations in quest of nature's idyllic simplicity you come upon a pretty maid dressed in gauzy costume; she reclines upon the velvet sward reading a novel, as her lily fingers pensively caress the silken cars of a pet canine. From your retreat among the bushes you aim your little camera; you focus your ground-glass; you slip in a plate-holder and fire away. Chuckling to yourself, you load your traps upon your back and see yourself to some other scene.

You see through the interlaced bushes a pair of lovers cosily ensconced in a rose arbor. The lovers wot not of your dangerous proximity. They are wholly, totally, conclusively wrapped up in the sweets of love's young dream. His arm is about her waist and she is gazing up at his manly features with soul-absorbing eyes. Is it not a picture worthy the limner's art? It is. You aim your little gun and you take that pretty picture, and you steal away with the idea

You take that pretty picture, that you've got something great. You have, you have! Just wait for the harvest before you congratulate yourself.

You wander about as free as a bird, only birds of the present day do not go forth with little cameras, seeking whom they may "take." You have many, many pictures as the result of your day's work. But, among all your successes, none so utterly successful as the maiden reclining upon the velvet sward, and the lovers in the rose arbor.

By the way, you are a stranger to all parties. Better for you you'd gone and hung yourself than show the picture of the lovers to the lady whose feet you elongated. But you wot not of the sorrow, and blunder on in your mad career to show off your art-folio.

Does the lady get wroth? Would the confiding wife get upon her heels and jaw the air if shown a picture of her hubby hugging another woman? Human nature is the same the wide world over, and women more so. That lady of elongated feet now figures in the courts as the plaintiff in a divorce case. That husband is a doomed man and—the other lady is down several pegs in the estimation of her sex.

How is it with you, oh, amateur aspirant for photographic fame? You are the central figure of the case, and your camera brought you into this most unpleasant prominence. If you must go forth with your camera, for Heaven's sake fire at barns, cows, rocks, placid streams and inanimate scarecrows; but beware how you tackle humanity.

Two Boston Legal Stories.
[Boston Journal.]
A clerk of one of Boston's courts tells a very good story of a somewhat flighty lawyer who was once trying a case in which there was a great scarcity of witnesses, and the evidence was about all circumstantial. Finally the lawyer got excited and exclaimed: "Why, judge, the angel Gabriel came to me last night and said this man is innocent." The judge, who happened to be writing, did not even look up, but said in the most matter-of-fact way: "Let him be subpoenaed."

Another legal story relates to Gen. Butler and Judge Hoar. The judge is a very dignified man, has no relish for pleasantries in court such as the general enjoys, and, besides, does not love the general very much. One day the judge read an extract from some law book, and the general, as is his wont, asked to see it. "There it lies," said the judge sternly, as he pointed to it. "Yes," said the general, as he took it up, "there it does lie." The dignified court got decidedly the worst of that bout.

Incidents in an Absent-Minded Household.
[The Hatchet.]
A Washington physician was discussing his enemies in Judge Mackey's office. Among other things he said: "I know, judge, my patients never slander me nor criticize my knowledge and treatment."
"No," replied the judge, with a sly twinkle of the eye, "dead men tell no tales."

Like Papa's.
[Wall.]
"Well, young gentleman, how would you like your tail cut?"
"Oh, like papa's, please, with a little round hole at the top."

A Horrible Suggestion.
[Chester Evening News.]
If Secretary Whitney has so much trouble with the Dolphin, what would he do if he had a REV?
