An Old-Timer.

The Hudson Bay Company's steamer Beaver, which was advertised to be sold a short time since at Victoria, B.
C., is the oldest steam vessel on the Pacific Coast—in fact was the first.
The vessel was built in England in 1834, and came under sail-schooner rigged. Her machinery and boilers were in place, the paddle wheels and shafts, so as not to interfere with her sailing, being stowed aboard. She has the same engines now, the name of the maker and the date 1834 being in conspicuous brass figures on the front of them. The vessel was staunchly built in every respect, both in hull and machinery, as has been proven by the length of time—now over fifty years—that she has been in active service.
The Beaver is less than 300 tons burden, has an old-fashioned square stern and her paddle wheels, instead of being amidships, as is usual in other steamers, are well forward. She is an odd looking vessel, and has the appearance of belonging to a past century. In her day she has been of the most efficient service to the company to which she belonged. She was built to trade with the Indians of the Northwest coast, and for carrying supplies to the trading posts on Vancouver Island and Frazier river. Owing to the danger in early times of the service in which she was engaged, she was fitted out like a man-of-war—the bulwarks were high and the boarding nettings were hoisted when at anchor. She had a battery of four six-pounders, and a plentiful supply of small arms and ammunition, so placed as to be ready at hand for the officers and crew in case of an attack.
There were guns and pistols even in the engine room. During the Indian war of 1855, Governor Douglas, of Vancouver Island, the chief factor and resident head of the Hudson Bay Company, very generously tendered the Beaver to the authorities of Washington Territory—there was no steamer on the coast of American settlers. The vessel was used on more than one occasion in the transportation of United States troops to the threatened points of attack. The Beaver, instead of being sold, it would seem, ought to have been laid up in ordinary for good service rendered and as an old curiosity.

Anecdote of Artemus Ward.

In the winter of 1860-61 Artemus Ward was traveling as advance agent for Gisian E. Dodge, and one day entered the office of the Citizen and Gazette, at Urbana, Ohio, (where the writer was at that time engaged as a composer,) to make arrangements for advertising.

After chatting some time with the editor, Mr. Joshua Saxton, one of the oldest newspaper men in the State, and a man of marble dignity, the droll showman started to go; but, pausing at the door, he turned back suddenly as if something had been forgotten, and said:

"By the way, Mr. Saxton, have you got a boy of—of—good, moral character?"

It was with a glow of pride that the editor rubbed his hands and told him that he had, for the youngest apprentice was at that time up to his eyes in the study of theology, and afterwards became a shining light in the pulpit.

"You are certain, Mr. Saxton, that he has—ah—been carefully brought up?" continued the humorist, with great gravity.

"Oh, yes; I am quite sure of it."

"He has no bad habits that you know of?"

"Oh, no; he's an exceptionally good boy. In fact, he's a model boy. What do you want with him?"

"Well," said Artemus, slowly, his face relaxing and a sly grin gradually creeping over his homely features, "I'd like to have him stick up a few bills for me."

Bayard's Willful Son.

The World's Washington special of November 30th says: A society paper here officially announces the engagement of James Bayard, oldest son of the Secretary of State, to Miss Deakins of Fort Pendleton, W. Va.
This is the sequel of a romance of young Bayard's experience at Suggs' Fort in that State. Young Bayard, on account of a foolish escapade with Butler Mahone and one or two other sons of Senators several years ago, was arrested by some Washington police.
The boys were discharged after a slight reprimand. Mr. Bayard was greatly mortified and sent his son home to Delaware. He has since forbidden his return to Washington. The father virtually cast off his son, as he would not observe his wishes. Last winter young Bayard taught school in the mountain town of Suggs' Fort, under the protecting wing of ex-Senator Henry G. Davis. It was during his winter's residence in that place that young Bayard fell in love with Miss Deakins. The latter is the daughter of an honest farmer. During the winter Miss Deakins found employment at a little hotel at Suggs' Fort, and it was there that young Bayard met her.
It is said that they became engaged last winter, and that the marriage was to take place as soon as the Secretary's son could get an office.

It is understood that ex-Senator Henry G. Davis procured the appointment of Secretary of Arizona Territory for young Bayard, so as to get him as far from West Virginia as possible and prevent a marriage that would not be approved by the proud Secretary of State. The appointment was procured through the joint influence of ex-Senator Davis and Senator Gorman, as the Secretary would not even listen to doing anything for his wilful son.
Whatever may have been the motives of Messrs Gorman and Davis, young Bayard remains true to his mountain engagement indicates that young Bayard will not go west until he can take Miss Deakins with him as his wife. It is understood that the Secretary of State still refuses to have anything to do with his son in any way.

Society in Dunkirk, New York, is agitated over the marriage of a Chinese laundryman with a white girl. The most exclusive circles took up the unpleasant pair, gave them a reception and treated them as social lions. Dunkirk is one of innumerable Eastern towns in which there is a great plethora of girls and a painful scarcity of young men able to earn a living for two. The attention of the ambitious young heathen of our crowded Chinatowns is respectfully directed to Dunkirk. Why should they remain here, where a girl would as soon think of marrying a golilla as a Chinaman, when white wives and social distinction await them in the East.

Saw a man yesterday who had made $10,000 this fall in wheat. Saw another man about ten feet behind him who told me how he made it. His wife inherited $10,000 in cash. She wanted to double it or lose it. Husband was perfectly willing. She gave it to him to invest in wheat and she lost it. Instead of investing a dollar he placed the whole in a bank, and has the certificate of deposit in his wallet to-day. Speculative wives are now firm and in good demand.—Detroit
