Company. position, showing, in endless array, the combined wonders of the world of inventive genius, there is probably nothing that has atbined beauty and intrinsic merit as the exhibit of the Wronght-Iron Range Company of St. Louis, Mo. "Wronght-iron," the very name is significant of the process of ever used. It burns less coal, is easier cleaned manufacture, which, at the very onset, overcomes the chief and great objection, hitherto work like a little man.

such an apparently insurmountable barrier, We keep the finest tobaccoes in Eugene mitigating against the durability of iron as applied to range or stove purposes. Home education teaches that the ordinary stove and stove cover made of cast-iron will inevitably and unexpectedly yield to intense heat. A stove cover accidentally dropped, if it be of the ordinary cast-iron of the average stove or range, will crack or break. result is obvious in both instances -a worse than useless appendage. Cast-iron, as applied in the manufacture of stoves, as well as anything else, is the crudest, cheapest and most fusible. Malleable-iron, to the contrary, differs in that it possesses great tebe held at Eugene City, beginning on the nacity. It is really the mainstay of iron manufacturing, and, unlike its lesser prototype, can be completely united by welding. It is of the highest grade of iron, and ranks next to steel. In view of these facts, the superiority of malleable and wrought iron articles for cooking purposes over cast-iron is so manifest that there is no room for doubt.

To attain this point by the production of ranges thus made, has been one of the studies to which the St. Louis Wrought-Iron Company have given years of labor, resulting in the development of a class of ranges which, on account of greater durability, is without equal in the world. Add to this the experience in this branch of industry which taught them best how to utilize the principles of heat for cooking and kindred pures, and the acme of perfection is attained a the products of the Wronght-Iron Range Company of St. Louis. In the resume of quanties to which this company so justly aims pre-eminence, may be mentioued certainty of operation and solid economy in the use of fuel-a quartet of merit seldom fect satisfaction. Respectfully,

This view of the efforts of this company towards benefiting mankind by a really su-perior article is borne out by the jury of wards of the class in which the St. Louis Wrought-Iron Range Company entered in competition, who awarded them the highest premium, three gold medals, for their en-tries, as follows: First gold premium on best hotel ranges, first gold premium on laundry stove, first gold premium best collective display of ranges, and silver premium on malleable iron water back. This sweeping tristoph, in face of the fact that the wares of this company were unknown this far south speaks volumes in favor of the real merit of the ranges, which so creditably passed through the crucible of critical expert ment and came out victorious over all.
