In discussing "Stock-Growing in Agri-culture," a Western writer makes one point which is too often disregarded. He avers that the stock-growing farm can be made self-supporting, which is not the case with all other branches of agricultful farming. It costs nothing but the saving, and it is a complete manure for all crop productions, and therefore in growing food necessary for the stock the fertility of the soil can be maintained, which otherwise is sure to deteriorate.
