Fir Stronger Than Oak.

Tacoma Daily Ledger. Some very interesting tests of woods native to Washington and others pative to other timber sections of the country were made recently at the Northern Pacific car shops. The purpose was to demonstrate the relative strength of the woods. There were present at the tests, Master Mechanics Warner and Phipps, of the shop, Engineers Lund and Haines and architect C. B. Tablot

The timber tested was subjected to an actual breaking, on sticks 2x4 inches and four feet long, to centers, being one-fourth as long, thick, and wide as an actual stringer as used by the railroad company in its trestle bridges. The test is important, as there seems to have been but little information on that subject, and the impression has been that ordinary oak was stronger than fir. The tests shows, however, that yellow fir is actually one-third stronger than eastern oak, and more than one-half stronger than Eastern white pine. The breaking weight, placed squarely in the middle of each stick
