LINES TO LUCILLE.

Your hair's as golden as the sun, Lucille, Your eyes are deepest blue; Your eyes are deepest blue; And never since the world began, Lucille, Was fairer maid than you.

You're graceful as the fabled fay, Lucille, The picture of exquisite health; And then you have, they say, Lucille, Sufficiency of this world's wealth.

But doth my heart with sadness fill, Lucillie, But down any markets give me only pain; Your graces give me only pain; For there is something lacking still, Lucille, And, dearest girl, I fear it's brain, —Larry Bradley, in Life.

He was particularly atta tive to the young youan I have mentioned, though he had never before met her, and they be came very fond of each other. When matters got slightly straightened out the young man became a reaf-estate agent on his own account, and among other business handled the estate of his fair fellow-victim. She was an orphan and he had no family connection to speak of. They seemed suited to each other, and my sister in writing to me often mentioned them and reported the progress of what she thought was their love affair. The young man managed the young woman's property so well that her wealth was doubled in value in ten years. They often consulted together on business matters, and he often spent an evening at her home, but he never escorted her to any place of amusement or to church, and they seemed no nearer a union than the day after the fire. They are still in exactly the same position. She has lost her youth and he is gray-haired. She has never received any attention from any other man, and apparently he has not thought or any other woman.
