Give Them a Chance!
That is to say, your lungs! Also all your breathing machinery. Very wonderful machinery it is. Not only the larger air passages, but the thousands of little tubes and cavities leading from them. When these are clogged and choked with matter which ought not to be there, your lungs cannot do their work. And what they do, they cannot do well. Call it cold, cough, croup, pneumonia, catarrh, consumption or any of the family of throat and nose and head and lung obstructions, all are bad. All ought to be got rid of. There is just one sure way to get rid of them. That is to use Boeche's German Syrup, which any druggist will sell you at 75 cents a bottle. Even if everything else has failed you, you may depend upon this for certain.

A Little Too Late—to doctor when Bright's Disease has done its work. Take Wright's Kidney and Liver Cure for inflammation of kidneys and liver, pain in back and other warnings of kidney trouble. Sold by all druggists.
Call a Halt—That tired languid feeling means that your system is in a state to invite disease, and Wright's Compound Extract of Sarsaparilla is what you need at once to expel impurities of the blood and build you up. Sold by all druggists.

What is it?
That produces that beautifully soft complexion and leaves no traces of its application or injurious effects? The answer, Wisdon's Boreline accomplishes all this, and is pronounced by ladies of taste and refinement to be the most delightful toilet article ever produced. Warranted harmless and matchless. F. M. Wilkin, agent, Eugene City.

Change is one of the irresistible laws of nature, and fortunately the change is almost invariably for the better. As an instance of this, St. Patrick Pils are fast taking the place of the old harsh and violent cathartics, because they are milder and produce a pleasant effect, besides they are much more beneficial in removing morbid matter from the system and preventing ague and other malarious diseases. As a cathartic and liver pill they are almost perfect. For sale by Osburn & Co.

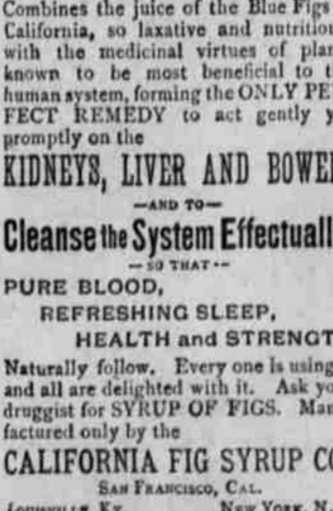

On a recent visit to Iowa, Mr. K. Dalton, of Dundy, Russell county, Kansas, called at the laboratory of Chamberlain & Co., Des Moines, to show them his six year old boy, whose life had been saved by Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, it having cured him of a severe attack of croup. Mr. Dalton is certain that it saved his boy's life and is enthusiastic in his praise of the Remedy. He says it has an excellent reputation in his vicinity; that farmers come fifteen miles to his store for it. For sale by Osburn & Co.

Kimball, South Dakota, Graphic: While the columns of the Graphic are open to any and all unobjectionable advertisements, yet it is quite impossible for us to speak knowingly of the merits of the various articles of merchandise advertised. Particularly is this true of patent medicines. But there are exceptions occasionally and a note-worthy exception is the celebrated Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. This now universally known medicine, has been advertised in the Graphic four or five years, but not until recently had we any personal knowledge of its wonderful efficacy, which has come about through the prevailing influenza and the stubborn cough that has so often attended it. In the writer's family this medicine has on several occasions this winter cured a cough that baffled any and all other remedies, and the number of families in Kimball and vicinity in which this remedy has been used with like effects attests to its value as a specific for coughs and colds of every nature. For sale by Osburn & Co.

The Eiffel Tower.
Miss Lura March writes the following personal observations of a visit to the Eiffel tower in Paris:
The tourist enters the elevator at the bottom, and is quickly lifted to the first stage, at a height from which he commands a fine view of the city. As far as eye can reach one boundless mass of houses extend before him. At each landing the occupants get out and take a good look at the world they have left behind. Each stage is well supplied with coffee stands, restaurants, shops, etc. The first one is so large that one enters unexpectedly upon a whole colony of aerial boulevards eager to sell, at exorbitant prices, souvenirs of the exposition. On the second course the tower begins to narrow rapidly and curves so much that the elevator moves up a very perceptible inclination, which is calculated to make a timid or nervous person feel that he is going to be spilled out into the void below. However, the doors are firmly closed and after he is once in, there are no means of escape. In the first and second courses the elevator passes up through one of the immense legs or supports of the structure. In these there is so much net work that the view is cut off and the beholder has to wait till he reaches his destination before he looks around him. From the second stage to the top we pass through the center of the tower, and from the window the person ascending can see the country expanding before him. Half way between the second stage and the top there is a change of elevators, though there is no platform. In mid air, so to speak, one passes from one lift to another, and goes on up, up one thousand feet into the heavens. The city diminishes in proportion as the landscape becomes more extended. Arrived at the top, on one side is the famous Bois de Boulogne, surrounded by its clusters of villages, the most imposing of which is St. Cloud. In another direction is the no less beautiful but less aristocratic woods of Vincennes. Next the Seine freighted with pleasure boats and threaded by bridges winding in a semi-circle through the city, catches the eye. Most of the renowned places are on or near the river, and by following its course one sees the towers which dot and beautify the wilderness of houses. The elegant and imposing Arc de Triomphe, which ordinarily dazzles with its splendor and casts in the shadow all other objects, looks meek and subdued from the tower. Eight matchless avenues radiate from this place, which is called the Star. One of these is the Champs-Élysées, which entices the pedestrian on and on till he can walk no further. This promenade could never look mean or shabby but seen from such a height it has the appearance of a short but elegant drive in some fairy land as it blends into and forms a part of Place la Concorde. Poor Louis XVI and his fellow sufferers would hardly recognize the place of their execution. At present it might well draw admiring glances from paradise itself. In the center on the spot where the guillotine stood rises the majestic Obelisk de Luxor. On either side are sparkling fountains. Monuments and statues fill up the spaces. Surrounding it as guardians of the beauty within are eight immense monuments to the principal cities of France. Facing this square at the end of a broad street is the Madeleine, a Greek temple adorned by Corinthian columns. Across the river in a straight line with the church is the Chamber des Deputes approached by a broad flight of steps and likewise set off by Corinthian columns. Joining la Concorde at the other extremity is the garden of the Tuilleries. The old gnarled trees are just bursting into leaves and blossoms, and it is difficult to decide which is the more to be admired, the natural beauty around one, or art in the form of fountains, manufactured lakes, graceful statues, etc., etc., which one sees in every direction. It is probably safe to say that this is the most perfect combination of the two distributed objects of admiration in the world. A walk through the length and breadth on a sunny morning, sparkling with dew, smelling of the woods and fields and teeming with most perfect productions of modern art is one of the charming experiences which fully realize our ideals. But I am wandering from the tower, for from there its dimensions seem small and it resembles a poorly kept garden plot. The spaces left for monuments are visible, but the statues themselves are not, so they look like waste places. Next comes the Louvre. It is without towers, but it covers so much ground that its simple straight walls are easily distinguished. Add to its historic value the treasures of art and antiquity which it now harbors and you can well imagine it one of the attractive features of Paris. Even to a rustic from the west its pictures and sculpture galleries are a source of inexpressible pleasure. What then must they be for the French who live for art alone? Opposite the palace is the quaint old church in which the kings of France held mass. With the Louvre the principal sights on the left side of the river, cease. Further down on rue de Rivoli is the Gothic tower from which Pascal made experiments on the pressure of the air. It used to be the favorite tower of ascension before Mr. Eiffel's brain cast it in the shade. Even now to my mind it is the prettier of the two. The Colonne de Juillet which fills the space where the Bastille stood is on the same side of the river.

Another distinctive feature of Paris is the boulevards. They have been built on the site of the ancient walls of the city, and are naturally slightly circular in form. Avenues, lined with double rows of trees and terminated with large squares artistically adorned, diverge from the center and run to the extremities in all directions. Innumerable church towers and spires stand out against the sky, and gardens filled with trees and flowers relieve the mind when tired of looking at the wonders of man's work. As our eyes wander back from the distance to our near surroundings they fall on the Notre Dame, also the tower of St. Chapelle. This the most artistic place in Paris, was built by St. Louis to hold the crown of thorns. It is a perfect little gem and on a bright day when the sunlight comes pouring in through its walls of stained glass it resembles an enormous precious jewel sparkling and dazzling everything with its brilliancy. In another part of the city is the Pantheon, a living example of Greek architecture. It was originally built in honor of St. Genevieve the patron saint of Paris. At present it is dedicated to the great men of the state. Its stately columns and magnificent dome readily mark it from the surrounding buildings. Within its vaults are the tombs of Voltaire, Victor Hugo and many others.

Its grandeur makes such an impression on the memory that we can almost see the sunlight falling on the marble crypt holding the granite sarcophagus which contains the remains of Napoleon. Around his bier are twelve marble statues, just inside of these and nearer to the tomb are the flags of conquered nations still waving. On the mosaic pavement are engraved the names of his great battles. Back of the crypt are the sarcophagi of his friends, Bertrand and Duval. At the sides are two chapels containing monuments to Turanne and Vanbarr. In chapels surrounded by domes are his brothers. The grandeur of his resting place is in perfect keeping with the genius of the man. Mind can not conceive of a more magnificent place than the tomb of Napoleon. Finally we look down on the dusty field of Mars and the long rows of exposition buildings. They now look lonely and deserted in spite of the crowds of all nationalities who are taking advantage of the first spring days to cast a lingering look on its once gay grounds. The principal attraction, however, is Eiffel tower, which will ever draw curious and admiring throngs. As we look down brilliant scenes and events enacted here come floating back on the wings of memory and we come away with fresh remembrances of the great exposition. At last the descent begins and we go flying down to earth and its inhabitants and are soon swallowed up in the roaring city.

Col. Mosier's Unselfishness.
The Indian war veterans of the Pacific coast, were holding their annual encampment in Portland, Oregon, on the 17th of June, 1890. Resolutions in regard to the death of Past Grand Commander Col. L. F. Mosier, were under consideration. Col. Kelsay, of Corvallis, had delivered an eloquent and appropriate eulogy, after which our first past grand commander, Col. T. B. Wait, of Salem, arose and said there was one thing he wished to say.

When General Joseph Lane was in congress, there was a United States district judge to be appointed for this district. Gen. Lane offered the appointment to his son-in-law, Col. L. F. Mosier of Roseburg, now lamented comrade. The large-hearted and noble colonel, who never allowed the interests of others to be jeopardized that he might profit thereby, said: "No, general; that will never do; the relation that exists between us would cause some to censure you, and in my opinion it would injure you politically. Oh, yes; I should like the office; the honor and the salary; in my present financial condition, would be very acceptable, but I cannot afford to sacrifice my general, and must positively decline." (Gen. Lane was Col. Mosier's commander in the Mexican war.)

General Lane then said "well, I will appoint whoever you name." There was at this time a blacksmith near Roseburg, who in his idle hours had studied law, and by the labor at the forge, and with the assistance of his noble wife's frugality, the yield of the golden butter and the fresh laid eggs, he was just able to keep the wolf from the door. One day was an eventful day in that smith's life. He had disposed of his basket of butter and eggs, and with the groceries which he had obtained for them, he was about starting for his humble mountain home; but he was stopped in the streets of the then little town of Roseburg, by our gallant and now lamented comrade, Col. L. F. Mosier, who presented Matthew P. Deady with his commission as United States judge of this district, (which appointment was for life.)

Great big tears of gratitude flowed down the cheeks of that disciple of Vulcan and Blackstone. For a while his joy was like our grief. Yes, his heart swelled within him, and he felt that words would fail to express his joy. And as God forgives us for our grief, so do we forgive the blacksmith for his emotional gratitude. And now, fellow comrades, let me state without fear of contradiction, that all there is of Matthew P. Deady, from that humble mountain forge, thirty odd years ago, to his present exalted position on the bench of the United States district court, he owes to our generous-hearted, gallant, brave and lamented comrade, Col. L. F. Mosier.

Stop the Leak.
The Roseburg Plaindealer, Republican, says: Now that the election is over and a good healthy republican majority in our next Legislature has been returned, the party will be held responsible for all injudicious measures it has passed or may pass. That railroad commission has now been in existence four years and has been eating into the state expenses, and, up to the present, no good commensurate with the cost has been accomplished, so far as we can learn. We are paying dear for the whistle. Better repair the act creating this fifth wheel to the government wagon.

Referring to the boodle club of Baker City, the late grand jury reported to the court as follows:

We are reliably informed that certain organizations were formed in Baker City for the purpose of selling their votes on June 2, 1890, in a body to the highest bidder. We consider such organizations as dangerous, and that they should be condemned by every decent member of our community.
The grand jury itself should be indicted for neglect of duty in neglecting to indict the guilty parties.
