A Terrible Fall.

The Oakesdale, Wash , Sun of June 13th gives an account of the fall of an aeronaut at that place during the day of the performance of the McMahon circus as follows: The announcement that there would be a bailoon ascension at 3:30, kept the people in esger expectancy all the afternoon. Goodalf, the aronaut, had been secured and was ready at the appointed time to start on his aerial flight. The balloon was inflated with heat from the fire beneath. When filled to its fullest capacity the ball-on was-xamined and found to be all right. Goodall arranged the trapeze and with the signal, "let her go" the monster sailed towards the heavens with Goodall sitting lightly in the swing. A shout of exclamation went ap as Goodall sent back the words, "how is this for high," but the next instant the balloon, now over 200 feet high, bursted from top to bottom, stood momentarily suspended in the air, then started downward with a rapid descent. The spectators stood agha-tat the scene, and shricks and groans were heard in every direction as the rider took his flight to apparent death. Looking downward, Goodall prepared to meet his fate with a presence of mind that few men posses, still clung to the trapeze as the baloon descended faster and faster. As the collapsed monster with its human freight fell 100 yards from the starting point, many eyes turned the other way, refusing to witness the eight. A second before lighting Goodall uttered a cry, then struck the earth with a dull thad. "He is a dead man" came from the lips of those who witnessed the awful scene. He was taken to the tent and a physicician summoned. On examination, it was found that both bones of his right by were broken and internal injuries sustained. He was carried to the Le-land house in the evening where he is being cared for at this writing. The physicians say he will be all right again. His escape from death is remarkable. For the first 100 feet the balloon fell slowly, then with a complete collapse, it fell swiftly to the ground. If Goodall had fallen otherwise than feet first, he would never have breathed afterwards. The balloon was burned on the spot where it fell.
