The silver question sizes up about like this; the silverite says: "We will vote to repeal the Sherman act if you will give us something better," to which the gold bug replies, "let us repeal it first and talk about the matter afterwards." So they get together like two parallel as before the receipt of the message.

Congress may take some action to restore general confidence, but it is well to remember that wealth cannot be legislated into mens pockets except in rare instances. Economy, industry and thrift will build up a country and people despite iniquitous legislation. Less calamity and hard times talk and more work are needed.

But cold geomet, and without transacting any bus-graphical facts are hostile to such romance. Portland merchants should return the compliment; take President C. H. Dodd of the Webfoot metropolis, go down and camp under the dome of the unsettled capital of California and pre-empt the trade of the Sacramento valley. Portland has as much right to it by virtue of position and ability to hold it, as San Francisco has to the trade of the Willamette valley. The scheme of the Yaquina railroad is amusing rather than anything else, but if it should really prod the Portland business men a little it may do that city and the state of Oregon some good. We of Southern Oregon know that Portland has been drowsy enough or careless enough to allow California to steal the trade of the southeastern part of our state and metropolis of our own state has been severely tested, if not strained, and we can quietly enjoy the spectacle of San Francisco's effrontery in filing a claim upon Portland's neglected dooryard.
