The mid-ummer number of Scribner's is a joy so far as illustrations go and illustrations in the magazine of today is made to go further than anything ise between its two covers, unless indeed, it be the advertisements and they are largely pictorial.
It is a little alarming, the manner in which such staid and long established periodicals as Harper's Scribner's and the Century are falling beneath the sway of fashion and discarding their familiar and really artistic covers in favor of fantastic Beardsley-like poster garb. One is startled into asking where it will all end. Then, too, the magazines that have come to us regularly, year after year, have grown dear to us; we regard them with that degree of respect and affection that is due to friendship of long standing, we have learned to wait for and welcome them each month and we are sensible of a slight shock accompanied by a feeling of disappointment when they present themselves arrayed in all manner of strange and startling apparel. It is very much in effect as it might be if revered elderly members of our should respective families pear before our astonished eyes dressed up in c'othes of the balltt.

Speaking of illustrations, there are some exceedingly elever color sketches in the late Scribner, but I think The Idler, though not so profusely illustrated shows more satisfactory work. One is disposed to wonder at the really beautiful things one sees in print these days between the covers of the cheaper magazines. A friend of mine is devoting isure moments to Dickens and Sir Walter Scott these delightful summer afternoons and we have fully agreed that the exquisite humor of the author of Martin Chuzzlewit and Great Expectations have not been exceeded by any subsequent writer, though we read somewhere the other day that it was not exhibiting good taste and literary discernment to like and admire Dick-As to Sir Walter one should, to thoroughly appreciate his masterpieces in prose, read him between the ages of ten and twenty.
