Junction City : Milling Company, MANUFACTURERS OF THE "WHITE ROSE" Several years ago I attended the superior ourt for the county of - A case of murder was to be tried. The evidence was altogether of a circumstantial character, but the prejudice against the prisoner was extremely strong, and no one doubted that a conviction would be the inevitable result of the trial. I arrived at the courthouse ust as the proceedings had commenced. It was a dark and tempestuous day, and the large pine forest which surrounded the building added to the gloominess of the The prisoner was ushered in under scene.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL.

guard of constables and placed in the dock The evidence disclosed that the deceased and the prisoner had been drinking together and had quarreled, that the prisoner had struck the decensed, that he had sworn he would be the death of him, that through the intercession of the bystanders a patched up reconciliation had taken place, willingly on the part of the de ceased, doggedly by accused; that the de-ceased had started to go home by his usual route, and that the prisoner had imme diately followed him, although his home was in a contrary direction; that sounds of strife were heard shortly after, that the lecensed had never again been heard of, that suspleion having fallen upon the pris-oner, his steps upon the night of the difficulty had been traced, that marks of a struggle had been found upon the earth and drops of congulated blood, and that the accused, having been asked to account for the decensed, denied that he had ever seen him after the moment that he left on the night of the difficulty. The previous quarrel, the threat, the evident unwillingness of the accused to become reconciled to the decensed, the fact that he followed him, the noise of the conflict supposed to have subsequently taken place, and the indications of strife and bloodshed that the path afforded, joined to the sudden disapearance of the deceased, all combined to ix the crime of murder upon the prisoner and he was forthwith arrested and confined in the jail of the neighboring county. Such was the case made out by the state, and it increased the excitement against th unfortunate individual at the bar. But he still retained the appearance of perfect calmness, and when called upon for his defense he answered that all the matters that had been testified to were doubtless true, but that they gave no evidence of his guilt; that it was true that he had quarreled with John Grimes, the individual whom he was alleged to have murdered, and that he had struck him; that the threat he had made was but the idle declaration of a man who is excited by liquor; that he had become reconciled to him unwillingly because he had no faith in his overtures; that he had followed Grimes that night because he had business with a neighbor in the direction of his house; but that Grimes having walked faster than himself, he had lost sight of him immediately and had not seen him again that night.

The defense was conducted by the prisoner in person, and it was evident to me that although the calm and collected manner in which it was made had its impres sion upon the judge it had none upon the jurors or bystanders. They had made up their minds as to his guilt and were deter mined that his life should be taken. The The solicitor general closed the case. He dwelt with burning and bitter eloquence upor the crime of murder; he spoke of the cool and deliberate manner of the prisoner and reproached him as one who could gloat like a cannibal over the mangled remains of his victim. He dwelt with great miauteness, clearness and ingenuity upon the train of circumstances "which co uld not lie," and he threw a web of guilt around the prisoner that no one doubted would involve him in destruction. But still the prisoner qualled not. The judge summed up the case to the jury, narrating the cir-cumstances and unfolding the law. He admitted that the facts were very strong against the accused, but that one material link was wanting. It had not been proved that Grimes was dead. He conclus ed by admonishing them that they should not convict unless they had sufficient evidence of that fact.

But this caution was thrown away upon the excited feelings of the jury, who, with out retiring, made up their verdict of guilty, and the foreman was in the act of signing it when the prisoner again rose. "I ask permission of the court," said he,

to call a witness who I think will relieve me of this diabolical charge, who will prove that my hands are not red with my brother's blood, who will show the in propriety and danger of a conviction upon circumstantial evidence - in short, who will satisfactorily convince even the malignant and demonlike heart of the solicitor general that I am innocent of this crime.'

'Have you any objection, Mr. Solicitor General?" asked the judge. "None," responded the state's attorney, with a bitter sneer, "but if he wishes to convince me and to save his neck from the gallows he had better produce John Grimes ! "That is precisely the witness I seek to introduce," said the prisoner. "Mr. Sher-iff, call John Grimes."

The proposition created great excitement. me of the bystanders laughed aloud. Others heaped bitter execrations upon the prisoner. The solicitor general sneeringly asked him if he would have him called again, and the judge was evi-dently fast changing his favorable opinion of the prisoner, who, he thought, was tri-fling with the court. I turned to the culprit and was amazed at the terrible change that had taken place in his countenance Its placidity and composure were gone. It was covered with livid spots, and immense drops of perspiration were rolling rapidly from his brow "Call again, in God's name!" shouted he at the top of his voice.

The sheriff repeated the call. The storm that had been slumbering for a short time now burst forth with tenfold violence. The rain beat furiously upon the shingled reof, the wind howled and moaned like a condemned culprit, and several of the large pine trees that surrounded the building fell with a tremendous crash, startling the already excited inhabitants of the courtroom. It was an awful scene without. It was a still more awful one within. The unearthly appearance of the prisoner, the sudden and awful change that had taken place in him, his solenin adjuration and his earnest manner, all had deeply affected the bystanders, and many looked as if they really expected to see the murdered man arise at the invocation. All were gratified save the implacable solicitor general, who sat scowling at the accused with a look of triumph and fiendish exultation on his countenance. The judge rallied himself and motioned to the foreman of the jury to proceed, when suddenly an individual arose, no one knew from where, and, striding to the witness stand and throwing off a huge cloak which enveloped his form, disclosed to the horror stricken and amazed crowd the pale and wasted features of John Grimes.-Cincinnati

" 'Now for retaking the citadel!' he exclaimed.

"The game continued, the gains of Augustinoff continued and before the dawn of day-and the nights are long in Russia -the aid-de-camp of the czar had parted with his vast landed property in the central provinces, his possessions at Moscow and his castle at Ukraine.

"Rising from the table, he filled and emptied his glass several times, walked up and down the room, passing his fingers nervously through his hair, finally return ing again to his seat. Opposite still sat Augustinoff, who appeared to be amusing himself with cutting and shuffling the cards.

"Bending over him, Peterhoff said in a low whisper: 'It is not day yet, Augustinoff. Do not rise."

"'And is there yet left some hidden treasure, general?"

"With livid lips and contracted brow, he gasped: 'And you are ready to take it, Aungstinoff? You love the same woman as I-the woman to whom I am engaged.
