Drift.

Chicago is just now in a turmoil of excitement over the coming municipal election. Interest centers in the probabilities of the mayoralty. The candidates for this office are so many and so clamorous that it is not easy to say who has the best chances for election. These candidates have a very frank and open manner of asking for votes that is rather startling to the John Handsaker went to Pleasant mind of a timid Oregonian. The courage with which they conceal their native modesty and place their respective claims before the admiring public is something to excit the wonder of the woman who was "not al lowed to vote." It seems somewhat barbaric and brutal, this open bidding for public favor, this blazoning forth of one's personal attractions and qualifications by means of street parades, brass bands, placards and poster busi ness. But that is because in dear, quiet, conservative Oregon we are not wont to do things in this fashion. The "wild and woolly" does not reach further westward than the summit of the Rocky range. The true citizen of Chicago sees nothing either astonishing or disgusting in the methods pursued by the politicians. It appeals to the Chicago love of noise and display and is in keeping with the spirit of this great roaring, restless, unclean city.

Chicago is great. It is destined to become the metropolis of America. Sometime in the future when it has grown out of its giant childhood it will awaken to a consciousness of its be grimed condition and proceed to wash its dirty face and hands, and to array itself lu purple and fine linen. Then shall we see realized our dream of the "City Beautiful," the ideal "city of the future."

She is said to resemble her famous (or infamous) predecessor Yrette Guilbert, only in the selection of her song. But she has not Guilbert's excuse for singing them. It is her beauty, of course, which delights Chicago and not the wickedly amusing songs.
