

WHEAT IN RUSSIA.

A Distinguished American Says There is a Big Shortage.

John W Bookwalter, the political economist of Springfield, Ohio, who is traveling in Russia, writing on August 14 gives a gloomy account of the condition of that country through which he passed. He says: "Throughout the whole distance to the Ural mountains from Moscow, nearly 1000 miles, the crops at best were very poor, but in five governments, of which Samara is the center and embrasing a region fully 500 miles square the crop even grass, were an absolule failure. In the government of for current expenditures. Samaria, twice as large as Belgium, they were burned out, and the farmers will not raise enough to supply one-fifth of the population. As the population of sack for the benefit of legisulators that region is about 12,000,000, a large importation of grain will be is a disgraceful state of affairs. required to supply the necessities of the people.

Mr Bookwalter was informed by less than 80,000,000 bushels of at the thrifty habits of California grain this year; that the stocks in Russia are completely exhausted, and with the stocks of the world so completely depleted, he says he cannot see 'how wheat under the circumstances is to remain down. This being true, and there is no reason to doubt Mr Bookwalter's statement, the wheat growers have much to encourage the belief that with him they cannot see how wheat is to remain down at the present prices.
