Rice Cultivation in Russia.

While rice has long been grown in Persia and the Trans-Caucasus, it was almost unknown in the interior of imported from India, and, as it was subjected to high duty, its use was naturally confined to the wealthier classes. Russia first commenced the cultivation of rice in the early 80s, and is 1888 the first steam rice-cleaning factory was opneed at Baku, and 1,612 tous were produced the first year. There has been a steady increase in the production of rice, and there are now five rice-cleaning factories in operation, and the annual product is more than 48,000 tons. The demand for rice has increased, and it is now generally used by the peasants throughout the empire. The quality of the native product is equal to that of the imported article. The residue is utilized, the broken grain being made into starch and the dour is given to hoge.-Scientific American.

ity. Percival was Algy's superior in every respect; it was a pity they both fixed on the Grey Horse, for if two fellows don't like each other, it's rather a bore to have them at such close quarters. But, as ill-luck would have it. nothing would serve Algy but the Grey Horse-chiefly, I believe, because his cousin had just been appointed.

I don't think Percival shared his dis like. He had got the best of it all round. The two men came against each other at every turn; they were both good shots, both first-rate riders.

But Algy carried his jealousy into his sport, and the other didn't, which gave him very much the advantage.

Gradually Algy was making himself horribly unpopular in the regiment, and, indeed, in all the neighborhood, by Russis up to 1886, the supply being the bitter cynicism of his tongue, and also by an idiotic habit of practical joking, which seemed to be growing upon him, and ended by shutting many doors against him. But he was a handsome fellow, tall, well set up, with awfully good manners (when he was so minded), and he was nearly always a favor ite at first; so when one door closed another opened, and his experiences, instead of doing him good, only served to make him indifferent to people's opinion, and a sort of "don't careishness" settled down on him, which did not help to make him more popular. When he and Percival both fell in love with Maude Lafone, we really thought there would be bloodshed; but fortunately for the peace of the realm. there never was a question as to which of the two Miss Maude preferred. Algy just walked in and won-and although girl, for she broke the sombre blackness of Algy's gloom. At the Perth station, where though there was now plenty of room in the train, she utterly declined to remove herself and her luggage from our carriage. Algy had drunk a lot of that beastly champagne you get at Perth.

I noticed he was very much flushed and excited when he returned to our carriage. He began giving our traveling companion details of his career borrowed largely from the pages of Rudyard Kipling, the most blood-curdling adventures followed each other in rapid succession, while I sat furious in my corner, cursing him for a fool. The and kept on saying it sounded like a romance-which, indeed, it did! There really was nothing Algy hadn't done; he had been in Jameson's raid, he had fought at Suakim, he had held a fort with a handful of men against thousands of Afghans, he was one of the three survivors of the wreck of the Drummond Castle. . . . I wondered how much the old girl would stand, but she swallowed it all down like milk. and when we got to Edinburgh, where we parted, she begged Algy to tell ker his name. To my disgust, I saw him hand her his card, and she warmly entreated us both, if we were ever in Edinburgh again, to come and see her in Drumsheugh Gardens. I thought Algy was going altogether too far, giving his name, with the regiment and all, to be discredited like this for the sake of a silly joke, and I pitched into him well as the train lumbered out of Waverley station. Algy laughed boisterously. "I didn't give her my name, you old duffer," he said, "I gave her Percival's. I happened to have a card of my immaculate cousin's in my pocket, and I handed it over to the old girl. Percival will be rather surprised if he meets her some day to hear that he is the 'hero of a hundred fights' that he has only read of in the newspapers." I saw that it was no use saying any more, so buried myself in my cigar and rallway rug. After a bit, the effect of the champagne beginning to wear off, Algy grew more morose again and raved against fate and Percival and old Lafone until finally he dropped off to sleep, to my great relief, and I was at last allowed to do the same.

A day or two after we had rejoined. Algy came into my room in the barracks with a face as white as a sheet, and a letter in his hand. It seemed he had thought better of his conduct to old Lafone and had written and telegraphed, imploring Maude to forgive him. And now she had written to say that the separation must be final, that on knowing him better she felt she couldn't trust him, and that a marriage would not be for their happiness. Algy must take this as final.

I read the letter over, and told him I thought she meant it. And so it turned out, for no humbling in the dust on the part of Algy had any effect. It was all at an end. The poor chap was frightfully cut up; the whole thing was his own fault, which, of course, wasn't a soothing reflection. There was nothing to be done, however, but to try and bear it. Soon after he applied to exchange into the White Lancers, and for some time I saw nothing of him. They didn't care for him in the White Lancers, and christened him "Melancholy Jaques." ter, and I think we were all glad when the regiment left Harpenden, and poor old Percival had no longer got the spectacle of the triumphant Algy perpetually before his eyes.

The engagement was likely to be a ong one, for Maude Lafone had very little money of her own, and the out-atelbow condition of her flance was proverbial. Things dragged on for a year, during which Algy's temper became something awful. I think he couldn't make up his mind to leave the regiment and try to get something to do; he was cut out for soldiering, and scarcely fit for any other occupation. Old Lafone had a little place in Rossshire, on the coast, where you could put in a couple of weeks very comfortably after plover, rabbits and such like, and even get a dozen or so brace of grouse. They had a little steam launch, and the deep-sea fishing was rather fun, all around Cromarty. About the time of the Inverness meeting Algy and I went up there and had a capital week's sport. All went well until the last day of our visit, when Old Lafone talked business with Algy, and upset him dreadfully. He said his future son-inlaw must make up his mind what he was going to do-whether he was going to try for an adjutancy or leave the army altogether. He (Mr. Lafone)

could not have Maude hanging on and spolling her life for nothing. All he said was fair enough, if he hadn't upset the whole apple-cart by saying that it was a pity Maude hadn't fancied Percival. I don't think he meant any thing by it, but Algy was simply furious, and there and then broke off the engagement. I think old Lafone was a hit startled, but Algy was too angry to listen to a word, and he left the house an hour after without seeing Maude,

In fact, he behaved like the wayward. ill-tempered chap he always was when anything crossed him; and yet I couldn't help feeling sorry for him, and, although I disapproved of the whole proceeding. I came away at the same time he did, and we journeyed together as far as Edinburgh.

At Inverness an old lady got into our carriage, apologizing for the intrusion, and explaining that there wasn't a corner anywhere in the train. Of course, we both put out our cigars, and protested that there was no necessity for the old girl's apologies, although I, for one, felt intensely aggrieved at her presence. What's one to do on a long ourney if one mayn't smoke? I thought it simple cruelty to animals, and then and there made up my mind to join "the smokers' league," If any such association exists for the protection of helpless males. I must say that this sort of adventure showed Algy at his best.
