What a Sugar Beet Factory Does for Farmers.

A GOOD CLASS OF SUGAR

The start of the biggest campaign any of the sugar-beet farmers of this state have ever engaged in was last week, when Mr. H. C. Smith, a member of the faculty of the University of Nebraska, delivered a lecture in a small high school in the northwestern part of the state. His lecture was well attended, and the farmers of the district were enthusiastic in their appreciation of his labors.

The lecturer began by stating that the sugar-beet factories in the state were doing a great deal of good, and that the farmers of the district were profiting from the work of the factories. He then went on to explain the process of making sugar from sugar beets, and showed how the factories were able to turn out a product that was valuable to the farmers.

The speaker also discussed the importance of sugar beets for feeding stock, and showed how the factories were able to turn out a product that was valuable to farmers.

The lecture was well received by the farmers, who were enthusiastic in their appreciation of the work of the factories.

In conclusion, the lecturer stated that the factories were doing a great deal of good, and that the farmers of the district were profiting from the work of the factories.
