Yes, gone-forever gone.

The hope's of other days,

We cannot now recall

The vanished hours of other days,

Yet still their shadows fall

And cast a shade o'er all the light,

As when the sun has set at night.

When life was bright and fair:

But as the years went swiftly by,

We saw the promise sweet,

Oh, can it ever be forgot?

Although the past is dead,

It seemed as though the future time

Would be as free from care;

The dark clouds gathered in our sky,

Of fairest, sweetest flowers;

Ere we could call them ours, It might have been, and yet was not stream. It was bitter cold and night was coming on. To add to the unpleasantness of his position it was not likely that his companions would come that way, as they were to meet at a place about a mile up the creek. He knew from experience that a wounded buck brought to bay was the worst thing in the world to fight, and he did not care to get out of the tree to test the qualities of the one in question. The deer was alert, and at every move of the treed hunter was on his feet in an instant, ready for what might come. Phin shouted for his companions until he was hoarse. Night came on, and every minute it grew colder. He remained in the tree, watched by the deer, from five o'clock in the afternoon

> A Book Agent Fifty Years Ago. In Scribner for March there is an illustrated paper on Alexander Wilson, the Ornithologist, from which we take the following account of his trials in search of subscribers for his now famous work: Wilson, according to his custom, had started for Pittsburgh on a trip to the West and South, which was to terminate at New Orleans. At the outset of this expedition, at Lancaster, he was encouraged by the Governor of Pennsylvania, who "passed some good-natured compliments on the volumes, and readily added his name to my list;" but, on seeking patrons among the Legislature, he found them "such a pitiful, squabbling, political mob, so split up and jostling about the mere formalities of legislation, without knowing anything of its realities, that I abandoned them in disgust." A still more displeasing experience awaited him a little further on,-at Hanover,where "a certain Judge took upon himself to say that such a book as mine ought not to be encouraged, as it was not within the reach of the commonalty, and therefore inconsistent with our republican institutions !"-a mode of reasoning which the ornithologist followed out by admit-ting the principle involved, and inveighing against the Judge's gross infaction of republican institutions in living in a large and elegant house, wholly beyond the reach of the commonalty; and, after establishing this position, he went on "pointing out to him the great influence of science on a young, rising nation like ours till he began to show such symptoms of intellect as to seem ashamed of
