TO MY BROTHER.

How darkly dawns the desolate day of affliction, when the misty torrent of grief overwhelms the soul as we in utter loneliness turn from the grave where we have laid to rest in their last dreamless sleep our loved ones! We would have gladly offered you our deepest sympathy in your hour of bereavement, had we not known how idle to attempt to assuage your grief, how utterly incapable our words to prophet, but an artless "Kennedyan" sist in going back to the nest. Finally reach you, in the midnight of your sorrow. We would have gone with you to your silent home from which the sunlight of your life had gone out forever, and gathered together the against the exasperated end of a man's determined to hatch a set of crockery mementoes of your brief earth-dream arm and immediately thereafter dream and a couple of flower pots out of the of happiness, but we felt it wrong to
