FUNGOUS POTATO DISEASES.

The Blight, Macrosporium Disease and Scab Distinguishing Features and Treatment. The blight attacks the leaves, stems and tubers. Generally the first effect tpon the leaves is the appearance of brownish areas, which soon become soft

The rapid spread of the disease is dependent upon certain condition of moisture and heat. A daily mean or normal temperature of from 72 degrees to 74 degrees F. for any considerable time, accompanied by moist weather, furnishes the best conditions for the spread of the disease. On the other hand, if the daily mean or normal temperature exceeds 77 degrees for a few days the development of the disease is checked. This fact explains why the potato blight fungus seldom occurs to any serious extent in section where the mean or normal daily temperature exceeds for any length of time 77 degrees. The macrosporium disease attacks the leaves and sometimes the stems, but never the tubers. The discase may ap pear at any time after the plants are from four to six inches high. It progresse slowly, three weeks or more passing bo fore all the leaves succumb. The tuber stop growing as soon as the leaves are

Irrigation of Orchards. The growth of fruit is destined to become a great industry upon the plains. The soil and climate are well adapted to fruit culture. The flavor is fine, the size of the fruit large, and its appearance very rich and beautiful, but fruit culture cannot be a success without irrigation. It does not take a great deal of water to irrigate an orchard. The is quoted as saying: Trees need water frequently during the first season. Ordinarily it has been found good practice to irrigate young trees once in two weeks until September; then withhold the water until November and give one thorough wetting just before freezing weather, and in case of a very dry winter an irrigation in February is very beneficial. This of course applies to well drained land. During the second season once a month is considered often enough to irrigate, if careful and thorough cultivation is given.
