But by the friendly and of a porter be got the sufferer out of the train, placed him gently in a cab and him taken to the hotel which he knew the sick man would receive every attention. Caring for him on the way tangible evidence of intention to back bade bim cheer up, for he knew a physician who was one of the highest authorities on the particular disease from which he was suffering. All the night the gentleman was exceedingly ill, nor did he improve much the next day. The following morning a would immediately call an international relation of the sufferer, who had been telegraphed for, arrived, and the kind hearted gentleman who had put off his journey to Eugland, thrown away his railway fare and spent two nights and a day almost constantly by the sick man's side handed over the sufferer to the care of his friend. Then, and not till then, did this gold-en hearted man decide to resume his in-terrupted johrnes.

Going into the patient's room in the covery.

The sick man was still extremely ill and not able to do more than press his benefactor's hand and whisper a few words of gratitude. The relative of the patient, however, who was no other than his sister, followed the gentleman out of the room and said: "You have not done me the honor to tell me to whom I and my brother owe so signal an act of kindness as that which you have shown to an utter stranger. Had you not so generously and so disinterestedly taken compassion on him I fear his relatives and friends would never have seen him again alive. In thanking you again for your kindness, therefore, I should like to know to whom we are so much indebted. Besides you forfeited the cost of your railway ticket. If you will allow me to reimburse you the amount"--

"Do not mention it," said the gentle man. "It is of no consequence. "You will at least do me the pleasure of permitting us to know your name?" "Certainly. I will give you my card." With these words the gentleman took out his cardease and handed the lady his card. She read upon it the name 'William Makepeace Thackeray.' It was some weeks before the invalid was well enough to resume his journey. but after his return to England one of the first visits he paid was to call upon the great novelist in company with his sister to thank him personally for the great kindness he had shown him whe as he believed, he should have died by
