"IMPEDIMENTA."

By GERALD BRENAN.

[Copyright, 1899, by Gerald Brenan.] In the chaos of trunks upon the steamship dock the Portmanteau and the Saratoga Trunk found themselves side by side. Under the circumstances it was awkward, but the Portmanteau belonged to a man of the world, and difficult positions were his forte.

The ice must be broken, and the Portmanteau made the first plunge. "I believe we have met before, mademoiselle?" he remarked to the Trunk. "I should not have thought," rather coldly replied the Saratoga, "that you would care to recall the circumstances. They were, at the least, distinctly pain-

"You allude, mademoiselle, to the episode of our two proprietors? That was undoubtedly painful, but I cannot see why it should affect our relations.'

The Saratoga Trunk was silent for a moment and then answered in mollified tones: "You are right, monsieur. Our owners' love quarrel need not extend to us. We are not in love.'

"Mademoiselle must speak for herself." said the Portmanteau gallantly. "By the way, the first scene of that unhappy drama occurred"-

"At Waterloo station. You remember, he intended crossing with her to New York and settling their difficulties en route. But she cut him dead at the station.'

"I remember," cried the Portmanteau. "She was superintending your transfer to the luggage van at the time. I lay on the platform ready and labeled, but after her cruel behavior he had me sent back to the hotel. Two days after we left London for the east '

"Ah, the dear east! It was there we met first, was it not?"

"Yes; at Shepheard's hotel. My master was coming back from India, and of course he had to see Cairo."

"And we belonged to a party of globe trotting Americans on a Nile voyage. * * I remember being placed next you on the veranda at Shepheard's. My mistress stole a look at your labels, and I heard her say to her married sister: *This valise belongs to a Captain Richard Assheton. I wonder what he is like and why he spells his name with a dou-

"The idea of calling me a valise! So American!" interjected the Portmanteau. "Still, your mistress was a very charming young woman and deliciously sprightly." 'She is charming still, though scarcely so sprightly. Do you know, mon cher, I actually believe that she felt that episode sadly." The Portmanteau sniffed impatiently.

"Then why did she act so?" he exclaimed. "It was all her fault."

"Nothing of the kind," the Saratoga retorted. "It was the fault of your Captain Assheton."

There was another silence, broken by the Portmanteau. "Well." he said. 'we need not quarrel about it. I remember when my master saw your mistress first. He asked a servant her name, and I heard him repeating several times, 'By Jove, this Miss Carrie Dunham is a deucedly pretty girl!'

"It certainly showed his good taste. She noticed him, too, because I heard her talking about him to her sister. Then they met on the excursion to the Grand Pyramid."

"So I heard. And the acquaintance ripened into his joining the party."

The Saratoga tittered. "I can recall the tender fashion in which he looked after me at Port Said," she murmured. 'You were quite neglected, mon ami." "Oh, but Miss Dunham kept me in mind. I can still hear her begging the captain not to 'forget his dear old Portmanteau. "The first proposal occurred at Malta.

She came down to the stateroom and told the whole story to her sister. She was sitting on me at the time." "She had put him on probation. I heard him tell his friend McClean. He was to meet her in London and receive her final answer. Ah, that answer! How can you females act so cruelly?" monsieur? Nonsense! My dear mistress had no alternative but to act so after the conduct of Captain

My mistress' brother-in-law was in the audience and saw him do it.'

The Portmanteau uttered a sharp exclamation. "And such." he said, "was fashion the presentation to Mile. Pattethe reason why Miss Dunham rejected en-haut from H. S. H. the rajah of my master when he came to London, refusing all explanation, and why she subsequently cut him dead at Waterloo station."

"Such was the reason," tartly answered the Saratoga, "and a very sound reason, too, so far as I can see.

The Portmanteau burst into a fit of laughter, much to his companion's disgust. Long and vigorously he laughed. ceasing at last only from sheer exhaus-

Tion. "And now," said the Trunk, "perhaps, monsieur, you will be good enough | What shall I do, Chrisse?" to explain the cause of your-your cachinnatory hysteria."

"What a clever trunk you must be, mademoiselle, to use such long words! Any one can see that you came from mademoiselle will only consent to a lit-Boston. The cause of my metriment, eh? Well, I was laughing over the very | theatricals, as it were-all will be xidiculous mistake made by your mistress and her donkey of a brother-in-

"Mistake, monsieur?"

"Certainly. The superb tiara which my master gave to poor little Fanny Patte-en-haut did not belong to him at all. He was merely an instrument in the presentation. The tiara was a gift from the rajah of Bundleapore, who had seen Fanny the previous summer in Paris. He sent the diamonds to her from India in the care of his friend, Captain Assheton. I ought to know. because they were stowed away inside me all the way from Madras. The whole story was in the Parisian papers at the time, and if your mistress' brother-inlaw had taken the trouble to read

"He does not speak or read French poor fellow!"

"Ah, that explains it. And so be cause of his ignorance two young hearts are to be severed and two happy lives blighted in their prime.

"It is very sad," sighed the Saratoga sympathetically.

"Sad? By Jove, mademoiselle, it is criminal. But let us consider. Is there no way by which things may be set right? Here we are about to enter the United States together. I am labeled for Newport."

"And so am I. Dear me, Monsieur Portmanteau, I never wished that I had the power of human speech so fervently as I do now! I should lose no time in apprising my dear mistress of that hideous mistake about Fanny Patte-enhaut.

"Human speech is out of the question," said the Portmanteau. "We must hit upon some other scheme. Ah, I have it!

"Monsieur, you are a genius." "You flatter me, mademoiselle. And yet the plan is not unclever. This morning as Banks was packing me he wrapped some novels in an old newspaper and placed them right under my lid, on top of everything else. I can feel them there now. What, think you, was the newspaper used?" "Indeed, I cannot guess," said the Saratoga.

"It was a copy of the Gaulois containing a full account of the presentation of Fanny Patte-en-haut on behalf of the rajah of Bundleapore. I am sure, because Banks read it over with a reminiscent chuckle before he wrapped it round the novels." "But how about your plan?"

"Is it possible that you have not surmised my plan? In a few minutes the custom house people will come along. I shall simply slip when they open me and cause those novels and the Gaulois in which they are wrapped to fall in your direction. You can roll over slightly and possess yourself of the newspaper. When your mistress or that perky French maid of hers comes along, take care that she notices the Gaulois and leave the rest to fortune.' "A good plan, monsieur. But- too much is left to fortune, I fear. And here come the custom house officials, with Mr. Banks to open you. Now for The Portmanteau strained himself with excitement until his straps creaked

The custom house inspection was in progress. Miss Dunham and Captain Richard Assheton stood near their respective heaps of luggage, while the latter's valet and the former's maid attended more directly to the matters in hand.

As Clarisse, the maid in question, was about to unlock the Saratoga trunk her quick eyes caught sight of a newspaper lying on the dock floor. 'Ah," she exclaimed, "Le Gaulois!

It is a good omen, this message from

"Oh, mademoiselle, what an occurrence!" she exclaimed, pointing to the article in the Gaulois. It was a long article, and it described in truly Gallic Bundleapore, through the medium of the rajah's obliging friend, Captain Richard Assheton.

Miss Dunham gasped when she read this revelation. Then her fine eyes filled with tears, and she turned sadly to her maid. "Oh, Clarisse!" she whispered, "and I refused him for that and cut him so cruelly at Waterloo last year, and-and traveled all the way over in the same ship without speaking to him once. And all the time I have loved him.

Here Miss Dunham sank back upon the dock railing.

Clarisse's eyes brightened. "Mon Dieu!" she cried. "I have a scheme. If tle innocent deception-a little private Miss Dunham vielded, and a few minutes later the bustle of that section of the dock was interrupted by the fainting of a young and beautiful lady. As fast as his legs could carry him Captain Assheton reached the Saratoga trunk and its precious burden. Clarisse gazed at him tearfully.

"Ah, M. le Capitaine," she murmured, "it is all about you!" "About me?" said Assheton gruffly "Can't see why my presence should make her faint, considering we came over together without exchanging a word. Clarisse held out the newspaper. "Voila!" she exclaimed. "It is only this minute that mademoiselle learned the true story of that affair at the Folies Bergeres." Then while eagerly chafing her mistress' face and hands she poured into Assheton's ears the whole story of the mistaken brother-in-law and the natural error of Miss Dunham.

Just as the narrative ended Miss Dunham opened her eyes. They met those of Captain Assheton. "Carrie," said the captain, "is true-this about the mistake?" "Oh, Dick," cried Miss Dunham, "it is quite true. How can you ever forgive me?"

It was at this point that Captain Richard Assheton relieved Mlle. Clarisse and assisted Miss Dunham to a cab.

"Well," said the Portmanteau to the Saratoga Trunk as they were being hoisted into the same wagon, "how did my little plan come off?"

'Ah, mon cher," cried the Trunk ecstatically, "it was admirable! There will be a wedding before Advent.' "And then we shall always travel together, you and I?"

But the Saratoga Trunk was coy and answered not.

About Walfing.

The old proverb that all things come to him who waits advances a very pretty and pleasant theory, but its literal interpretation makes it capable of great misconstruction, for if it is in one sense true its reverse is equally true. Nothing comes to him who waits. Nothing comes to him who waits and does no more. There is nothing in the world that is of any value that has not to be struggled for, and those who sit down and fold their hands, expecting fate and fortune to bring them what they most desire, will meet with the disappointment they

The Giving of Tips.

Tips were always out of harmony with the independence and self respect of true Americans. Good pay for good work, with no unearned gratuities, in hotels, restaurants and everywhere else should be the custom. Tips are degrading both to givers and receivers, and the whole system of tipping is unsound and inexcusable. It cannot endure.

No club of any real distinction and importance permits the giving of tips within its jurisdiction, and the practice of distributing gifts for services which have been amply and even generously remunerated has no basis which is wise and wholesome. Never yet has there been an argument in apology for this abuse which was worth a moment's consideration.- New York Tribune.

Notice is hereby given that in compliance with the provisions of the act of Congress of June 3, 1878, entitled "An act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and Washington Territory," as extended to all the Public Land States by act of August 4, 1892, Ira W. Gardner, of Asbestos, county of Jackson, State of Oregon, has this day filed in this office his sworn statement No. 2635, for the purchase of the SW 4 of Section No. 29, Township 23 South, Range 2 W., and will offer proof to show that the land sought is more valuable for its timber or stone than for agricultural purposes, and to establish his claim to said land before the County Clerk of Jackson County, Oregon, on the 28th day of August, 1902.

He names as witnesses: Lee Mitchell, Wm.

County, Oregon, on the Satt and 1992.

He names as witnesses: Lee Mitcheil, Wm. Mitchell and Frank Hammond, all of Asbestos, Oregon.

Any and all persons claiming adversely the above-described lands are requested to file their claims in this office on or before said 28th day of August, 1902.
