Training the Vines.

Disappointment is sometimes experienced in the results of newly planted vines, but it usually comes from lack of proper treatment and knowledge of the nature of clinging and twining vines. The growth that has been made on a plant without the opportunity of clinging will not make new tendrils, as a general rule, so new growth must be depended upon for clinging. This being the case, the old tops may be even when planted alongside a suitable place to ascend. What they need is encouragement. They must be tack ed or tied up closely to the object. The manner in which they respond to a support is amazing. Therefore give the vines support immediately they are
