[Written for the SENTINEL.] To 'Ilion.' Vay vs. con dios.

Adieu, false one! I'll weep no more! Forego, my widow'd heart, this pain : Alss! thy dream of bliss is o'er, And theu canst never love again! Then cease thy woful strains, my heart, That rise twith melancholy swell; And bid thy dearest joy depart, thou from whose love-lit eye, of hope beam'd radiently, of joy in coming days! happiness is o'er !in grief for evermore.
With setly spoken, fond Farewell!

No more I see the resente glow That luvered once upon thy brow : Thy features tell a tale of woe, Since then hast broke thy plighted vow. That so welly whispered vow, that smile, That siren voice and courteous mien, Were all fraught with malignant guile.
Which else than blinded love hadst seen.

Go where thou wilt, 'tis naught to me ! But I would never see thee more ; Since I have been so true to thee, Nor ever loved but thee before ; And thou to me, - false as you prove --Hast ever been, since first we met, The floi of my purest love,-Rewarded, now, with deep regret.

Go, then, where I may never bear Thy voice, nor see thy faultless form ; And let me strive, from year to year, To keep love's genial embers warm. wo'd not crush my every hope Because life's richest boon is gone; For aweetest flowers untimely ope Where late the hot simoom has flown.

Can I forget thee when long years
Have worn me with heart-felt regret? O. no! thy name, embalmed in tears, I never, never can forget. But cease thy woful strains, my heart, That 'rise with metancholy swell' And old thy only joy depart With sweetly spoken fond Farcesil.
