you a little story, and let me call it " Miss

Peasely's Revenge."

Mass Peasly was once betroughed to a young feller which was engaged into merall the world of her, and stated that onless she consented to be his'n, he should loose all relish for vittles, and his dead corps would be found floatin' in the river some fine mornin'. Miss Pensly rekiprocated his pertended love, and, like a good girl as she was, she said his people should be her people, and where soever he went she would likewise wentest with him. But she never wentested. The false lover went and married a rich young gal, with a temper like miserable by her cuttings up, which it pleased Miss Peasly. But she wasn't sufficiently revenged as yet. She bided her time, and it come. The mercantile man Yes, certainly." I replied, "we work got religion one day, and it was given out that he wou'd be babtized on a certain That's what makes us sick." Sunday, with some other converts. A large crowd a-sembled to see the babtismal, and as the minister was lead in the mercantile man into the lake, Miss Peasly stepped up and gave him a large bar of yeller sonp. The minister was so astonished he scarcely knew what he was about; he took the scap in one hand and the merthe crowd on the shore of the lake at the Miss Pensly was revenged.
