those lovely feet.

I saw her from my window
Go tripping down the street;
Her form was most superb, but, ah!
Who ever saw such feet?

I heard them patter, patter go,
Soft as an angel's tread:
"So small," said I, "I never saw
Before, or even read."

I seized my hat and followed
The unsuspecting "fair,"
And watched the lightly-tripping feet,
That seemed to tread on air.

"Who can she be?" I wondered;
"She's beautiful, I know—
A fairer woman never trod
This earth of ours below!"

She stopped—she'd dropped her kerchief
(I'm always quite gallant):
I picked it up with prettiest bow,
And, thunder!—'twas my aunt!

Presidential Visit to the Army.

[From Special Correspondence Sac. Union.]

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1863.

As it is not every day that one can get an invitation to accompany the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States on an excursion to the vastest army now on the face of the earth, you may be sure that your correspondent promptly availed himself of a request to make one of the small suite of the President on a late visit to the Army of the Potomac.

The thoughtful wife of the President, an able and noble woman, ought to have the credit of originating the plan of a tour through the Army by the President, as she saw what an excellent effect would be given to the troops, now in good condition and ready to march, by coming in contact with their Commander-in-Chief and his family.

The party was small, consisting only of the President, Mrs. Lincoln, "Tommy" Lincoln—the President's ten-year old boy—Attorney General Bates, Dr. A. G. Henry, Surveyor General of Washington Territory, Captain Crawford of the Overland service, and your humble servant. Though the trip had been postponed for several days on account of unfavorable weather, it was snowing furiously soon after the pretty steamer left Washington Navy Yard, and before night the wind blew a gale, so that we were obliged to come to anchor in a little cove on the Potomac, opposite Indian Head, where we remained quietly until the morning of the 5th instant. It was a rare chance for a daring rebel raid upon our little steamer had the enemy only known that the President of the United States unattended by any escort and unarmed, was on board the "Carrie Martin," which rode peacefully at anchor all night in the lonely roadstead. And it was a scene which was peculiarly characteristic of American simplicity in the some-what dingy but comfortable cabin of the steamer on that stormy night, where the Chief Magistrate of this mighty nation was seated familiarly chatting with his undistinguished party, telling stories, or discussing matters military and political, in just such a free easy way as might be expected of a President who was out on a trip of relaxation from care and toil. There was no insignia of royalty or pomp, not even a liveried servant at the door, but just such plain republican manners and style as becomes a President of a republic, were to be seen. And though the rebels might have gobbled up the entire party without firing a shot, nobody seemed to think that it was worth while to mount guard to prevent so dire a calamity; and nothing of the kind occurring, we arrived safely at Aquia creek next morning—the snow still falling.

General Hooker's headquarters are quite as simple and unpretending as those of any of his men, as he abhors houses and prefers tent life, being unwilling, he says, to live in better quarters than his humblest soldier. The headquarters are about three miles from the Rappahannock in a direct line, situated upon a high, rolling ridge, and are not very extensive, as the staff is not large nor extravagant. The various staff officers and aides have their tents on either side of what forms a street, at the head of which is the wall tent of General Hooker, which at the time of our visit was by a couple of similar tents put up for the President and his party, who were provided with the luxury of a rough board floor, stoves and camp-made bedsteads, and real sheets. The quarters were comfortable, and the President and Mrs. Lincoln enjoyed the sharp contrast with the White House hugely, while "Tod," the juvenile Lincoln, had made the acquaintance of nearly every tent before the first day was done. The headquarters has every convenience for army use, as there are here a printing office, telegraph office, topographer, stenographer, artists, bakery, not to mention various mechanical shops and their appurtenances.

The 5th was so unpleasant that nothing was done further than to receive the officers of Hooker's staff by the President who shook hands and had a pleasant word with each one. But on the 6th there was a grand cavalry review by the President and General Hooker. The entire cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac is now massed as a whole, instead of being distributed among each of the corps as formerly, and is commanded by Major General Stoneman, the best cavalry officer in the service, Brigadier General Averill, the hero of Kelley's Ford, being the second in command. The cavalry force is probably the largest ever known to warfare, being now about 17,000 larger than the famous force of Murat, who is esteemed the pattern of all cavalry officers.

The President-to-day used a saddle which had lately been received by General Hooker from Main & Winchester, saddlers in San Francisco, as a present from that firm. It is a very handsome affair, and, as Hooker well said, could only have been made in California, as its style and thoroughness of workmanship is just what a military Californian can best appreciate. The donors will, perhaps, be gratified to learn that so excellent a horseman as the President was the first man to sit astride their magnificent gift. General Hooker has also lately been presented with a fine horse by George Wilkes, formerly of California, and he rode him for the first time in some of the reviews which we witnessed during our stay with the army. The General prefers to ride his old war-horse, a light grey, which has been with him during all of his fights; but the gift of Wilkes is a splendid animal, a dark chestnut in color, of great power and graceful action, costing a fabulous price, I am told.

Of the contraband intelligence gathered during the stay of your correspondent with the Army of the Potomac, I may safely select, perhaps, one item which may be of interest to those who will read of its achievements before this letter is printed. The camps are scattered over an extent of country which comprises over twenty miles in extreme distance from point to point. At this present writing there are upon the rolls of the army 216,718 men, of which 16,000 are upon detached service, 2,207 absent on furlough, 136,720 in active service, 1,771 absent without authority, 26,000 sick—the actual effective, available men being 146,000, which will be increased to 169,000 when the army shall move, by calling in men from various outside stations. Of this enormous force a considerable fraction must, of course, remain behind to guard the base of supplies and the line of camps which will be massed somewhere.
