

THE OREGON SENTINEL.

A Copperhead Prayer.

Again the clouds of battle lower
With terror and dismay;
Protect me, All-Destroying Power,
In this disastrous day.

As in the camp the soldiers bemoan
To riot, curse and swear,
"Would give my plumbum concern
To have my boys go there."

Then while my neighbors and their sons
Are called to war and arms,
Great that my home, secure from guns,
May cultivate my farms.

And while with taxes and expense
My kindred are distressed,
Or great that all we hard earned power
May slumber in the chest.

And should the rebels gain the day,
And all their lies condone—
Then may I wash my hands and say
I never opposed them.

Yet if, by Thy dispensing will,
My own dry pains throb at me,
Oh, may I find a shelter still
In her indulgent laws.

And should she disbelieve my word,
May I upon her call
To witness I never drew my sword
Or fired a gun at all.

For since from frailty and mistake
No mortal mind is free,
I wish no active part to take,
But leave the whole to them.

Though impious pirates on the seas
Our merchant ships depose,
Yet shall my spirit rest in ease
Till foes invade the soil.

Then let the clouds of battle rave,
My powerful valrs shall sing,
And even, even, and all I have
Fall shrive their valor bring.

O, may my lands yield twenty fold,
The way to supply;
May fat contractors, fraught with gold,
My anxious harvests buy!

May Federal rags no more
Cover the place of souls;
But crown my basket and my store
With blessings from the skies.

What though the fig-tree shall not bloom,
Or even seek the stall;
What though it be Thy righteous doom
That half our youth shall fall—

Yet, if Thou wilt Thy servant bless,
And my posterity,
Thy joy in my own righteousness
To prosperity.

Speech of Senator Sumner.

[From the Sacramento Union.]

Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, who is Chairman of the Committee on "Foreign Relations" in the Senate, delivered a speech in New York, on the 10th of September, in which he discussed at great length foreign relations, particularly with England. It fills three and a half pages of the New York Tribune, and may fairly be classed as a speech of great research and power. Upon the fine points considered, it exhibits argument, authority and historical illustration. As the production of a Senator who aspires to be considered as a statesman, it should, in its preparation for the historical leaf, have been kept a little more free from the ultra expressions of the author on slavery. He intends that subject upon the reader in season and out of season. But his argument and authorities against the act of the English Government which elevated the rebels to "certain belligerents," are unanswerable—are absolutely conclusive as to the policy or morality of the act. Under the head of "perils from England," Senator Sumner said :

"There is one act of the British Cabinet which stands foremost as an oven of peril—foremost in time, foremost also in the magnitude of its consequences. Though plausible in form, it is none the less injurious or unjustifiable. Of course I refer to that inconsiderate proclamation in the name of the Queen, as early as May, 1861, which, after raising rebel slave-mongers to an equality with the National Government in belligerent rights, solemnly declares "neutrality" between two equal parties, as if the declaration of equality was not an insult to the National Government, and the declaration of neutrality was not a moral absurdity, offensive to reason and all those precedents which make the glory of the British name. Even if the proclamation could be otherwise than improper at any stage of such a rebellion, it was worse than a blunder at that early date. The apparent relations between the two powers were more than friendly. * * * Lord Chelmsford, of professional renown as Sir Frederick Thesiger, now an ex-Chancellor, used these words recently in the House of Lords : 'If the Southern Confederacy had not been recognized as a belligerent Power, he agreed with his noble and learned friend (Lord Brougham), that, under these circumstances, if any Englishmen were to fit out a privateer for the purpose of assisting the Southern States against the Northern States, he would be guilty of piracy.'

The Senator shows from the highest English authority that, 'if the Southern Confederacy had not been recognized as a belligerent power,' ships assuming to make captures in her name would have been declared "pirates," and treated accordingly. From being classed as pirates, and captured as such, they were released by the proclamation, issued in the name of the Queen, which recognized the Confederacy as belligerents and raised them to an equality before the law of nations with the Government of the United States. This Senator Sumner treats as an act totally injurious, either by the law or practice of nations. The history of the past presents no case which can be considered as a precedent. It was, too, as the Senator shows, the recognition of an ocean belligerent, who possessed neither navy, commerce, nor a port which he could command. He also shows that a prize Court is absolutely necessary to the examination of a legal capture under the laws of war; after a ship is captured, it must be regularly condemned before a prize Court and ordered to be sold for the benefit of the captors. The right to capture does not carry with it the right to burn and destroy merchant ships, at the will of the captors; and hence it is argued that the destruction of merchant vessels by such ships as the Alabama, sailing under the Confederate flag, is contrary to the law of nations, and places those ships below the world in the positions of pirates. We quote from the speech :

From the reasons of the case, there can be no ocean belligerent without a port into which it can take its prizes. Any other rule would be absurd. It will not be enough to sail the sea, like the Flying Dutchman; the ocean belligerent must be able to touch the land, and that land its own. This proceeds on the idea of civilized warfare, that something more than naked force is essential to the completeness of a capture."

The Senator quotes among other English cases to sustain his position, that of Captain

Kidd, who was tried, condemned and executed as a pirate—though he claimed to be acting under a commission. Of this case the speaker said :

"It is none other than that of the famous Kidd, who, on his indictment for piracy, as long ago as 1695, produced a commission in justification. But it was declared that it was not enough, he must also show a condemnation of the captured ship. The Lord Chief Baron of that day said that if he had acted pursuant to his commission, he ought have condemned ship and goods; that by not doing so, then he showed his sin, mind and intention; and that he did not act in that case because of his commission, but quite contrary to it; that he took the ship and shared the money and goods, and was taken in that very ship—so that there is no color or pretense that he intended to bring this ship to England to be condemned, or to have condemned it in any of the English plantations; and that while men pursue their commissions they must be justified; but when they do things not authorized or even intended by them, it was as if they had no commission."

Kidd captured ships and goods, and divided the proceeds among his crew without the intervention of a prize Court, and an English Court pronounced him guilty of piracy and he was hung as a pirate. The Confederate ship-of-war, Alabama and Florida, capture ships and goods, take what they can use, and destroy the balance with the ship; they follow the general set by Kidd, and as they do not take their prize into port for legal condemnation, are as guilty of piracy as Kidd, who was hung as a pirate under the British law. If they are not pirates, they are in cahoots of the seas, who cannot be convicted of piracy because shielded by the proclamation of the English Queen. Town-plunderers of American commerce were built, equipped and presented to England; they have no certain ports of refuge except those of England; they are, therefore, successors of the sea, or English armed ships, for the acts of which that Government will at some future day be called up on to respond in damages. The act of recognizing the rebels as belligerents, as shown by Senator, was an insult to the Government of the United States; for that insult England may yet be called upon to answer. In reading the speech of the Senator, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the English Ministers, in hastening to recognize the rebels as belligerents, accomplished all that was possible short of an armed intervention, which would have been a declaration of war. The acknowledgement of the independence of the rebel Confederacy at that time would have been an act of no more advantage, materially, to the rebel leaders. The Confederacy was admitted to be a belligerent power, which practically gave it a place among the Powers of the earth. We come with Senator Sumner to the conclusion that the act of recognizing the Southern Confederacy as a belligerent power was an insult to, as well as an outrage upon, the Government of the United States. Treaties existed between the two nations as well as commercial relations of the most intimate character; England professed to be the friend of the United States, but the moment this rebellion in the South broke out, the English Government laid aside all feelings and the obligations of treaties, took part with, and proclaimed them, almost at the beginning of the contest, belligerents, equal in their ports and on the high seas, with the Government of the United States. The ports of that nation were made as free for rebel privateers as they were for American cruisers. Does any man suppose this course would have been adopted by the English Government had it been the States in the upper Mississippi valley which revolted? They make no cotton nor sugar; they possess no ports into which English steamers could be run in spite of the blockade, and hence would not have been taken under the protection of the British Lion. Had the South produced no cotton she would never have been recognized by England and France. Poland has been in insurrection for nine months, but England manifests no disposition to declare Poland entitled to belligerent rights. Poland lies inland; she possesses no ports into which English goods can be smuggled, and she makes no cotton. As a consequence, her people will be left to their fate by the English people and Cabinet. Such, too, would have been the fate of the Southern States had they been located in the interior of this continent. The English Government would never have troubled itself to inspire officially as to the progress of a rebellion against the United States' national authority, begun and carried on by States which possessed no ports and did not produce cotton. The policy of England in her intercourse with other nations is governed by interest, and not by those principles which should control the actions of civilized governments.

EXCERPT.—They occasionally have quiet doings in our neighboring county of Burnt. Night before last Mrs. C., fifteen years of age, and six weeks married, ran away from the bed and board of her husband in Dogtown, with her former lover, S., who has just returned from Boise country with more money than he had when he left Dogtown and his young love. It seems that the match between Mr. and Mrs. C. was a runaway one, and also that Mrs. C. always loved S. better than C., so when S. came back from Boise and finds C. away from home the elopement is speedily consummated. The eloping parties are supposed to have gone to Boise overland. The deserted husband was in this city last night, quite disconsolate.—Mercerville Appeal.

A PHOTOGRAPH.—The South is turning on very much what we imagine he was, a plucky fellow, with a good deal of nerve and fire, but with comparatively little revenue force to fall back on; and the high Northern Falstaff, with unwieldy punch, and dandy mien, and fat powdered lungs, that he was to send to his loves the first blow, but, after a monstrous deal of sweating, and wheezing, and coughing, and groaning, and several knock-downs, and much lamentation on the part of friends, gradually discredited himself of his superfluous fat, and stands before the world a heavy giant, all muscle and bone, with lungs like bellows, a swallower, though somewhat dignified countenance, and a pair of fists that level a fortress at every blow.

THE NEXT SPEAKER.—The name of Schuyler Colfax appears to be everywhere mentioned in connection with the Speakership of the next Congress, says the St. Louis Democrat. At this we are not much surprised. The West is clearly entitled to the man, and of all Western Representatives marching in the Union ranks, no braver, abler, or more popular man than Schuyler Colfax can be found. We have had no communication with B-presents from this State, with a view of ascertaining their pro-wives, but we think we would venture but little in pledging him the entire Radical Union vote of Missouri, which we have reason to believe will exceed the votes of a majority of the members from this State.

A NEW GUNPOWDER.—A Frenchman has discovered a new method of manufacturing gunpowder, at Paris, and a company has been formed to carry the discovery into effect. The gentlemen representing the company has proceeded to Washington to lay the case before the American Government. It is eighteen cents per pound; that the raw material can be obtained from the ground almost anywhere without danger—a few paces, an empty bottle, water and fire being alone sufficient, in half an hour, to transform the raw material into powder. It can be used in gales without ignition, and is 20 to 30 per cent stronger than ordinary powder, and explodes with vapor instead of smoke, and does not foul the gun. If the powder will realize all that is claimed for it, it will be a discovery indeed.

CEREMONY.—A couple were engaged to be married the other day in Chicago, and every preparation was made to celebrate the nuptials, but the bridegroom did not appear. A messenger, however, brought the news to the waiting party that he had been drafted in New York and could not leave. The reply of the young lady was worthy of the occasion. With tear drops in her eyes, and her heart ready to burst with grief, she turned to the company and said : "I don't keep a darn; there's plenty more men in the world anyhow!" The meeting adjourned.

A married lady spent her two sons engaged in quarreling, and in hopes of stopping their dispute, she unthinkingly said to them : "You young rascals, if you don't behave yourselves I'll tell both of your fathers!"
