Possibly so -one of the present editors of the Unionist was editor of the SENTINEL for a long time and Mr. Nesmith had a due appreciation of services offered so cheap. But what of it? Mr. Nesmith had the confidence of the Union party in this State at one time and while entitled to the support of this or any other Union paper, at the same time was entitled to pay for it. He lays no claim to such support now, and with the light before us, it is not likely to be offered to him at any price. At all events, we make an emphatic denial of the silly charge of the ery particular-even though Nesmith himself said so.

But will Congress entertain such proposition? Not unless the lands simply withold the grant, and contract with any companies without reference road. But the act of the companies do not for a moment admit of such a concern, but are trying to barter the whole thing away for something they can own and govern exclusively.

But they will find that the parties; this crumb of comfort once vouchsafed by a magnanimous and great nation to an isolated people who have toiled for twenty years for their country's as well as for their own weal in the only part of its domains west of the Neva das and Cascades shut out from water communication, subdaing its forests, fencing its pratries and making roads over high mountains, over which to drag the necessaries of life, for a distance of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fitty miles, all the time with a craven savage foe at their backs, it cannot, I say, be possible that the little assistance once guaranteed them in the way of constructing a decent thoroughfare, is now been taken from them.

Or having seen the superhuman of forts put forth in our infancy in the im. provement of our country-in building our inland towns, in making our magnificent farms with their beautiful country residences, and in building of splendid roads over grand old mountains, and swarms of merciless savages, not only our own, but the nation's to subdue; having seen us attempt all without its assistance?
