The explanation, which astonishes a Frenchman as much as the incident did, is now given as follows: Seymore Hayden had taken off only twenty proofs of his etching, a river in Ireland, and had numbered each proof. He knew where nineteen out of twenty were, so his astonishment was so great when he heard that two of them were to be sold at the Salle Drouot. He wrote to a friend and told him to buy them at any price, and to see whether they were numbered: if not he was to destroy them there and then, coram populo of amateurs.
