OREGON.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 16, 1879.

Editor Commercial Advocate:—Being for a few days on a sojourn in your city, I have thought a few words in relation to Oregon and its resources, etc., would not be amiss to your numerous readers and the emigration coming to the coast. The State of Oregon is immediately north of California; bounded on the east by Idaho Territory; on the north by the Columbia river and Washington Territory; and on the west by the Pacific Ocean, and in this area it embraces 95,274 square miles of territory, being about 6,000,000 acres, with a population of near 200,000 souls. This rising young State embraces within her borders every variety of mineral, agricultural and timber lands, coupled with a productiveness and beauty of scenery unsurpassed in the world. No more rich field for well directed energy and enterprise with their consequent reward is afforded in the West, either to labor or capital, than is there to be found. The topography of Oregon divides it naturally into three grand divisions, Eastern, Western and Southern Oregon; and these divisions mark their own distinct peculiarities, each different from the other, and no two just alike. Eastern Oregon embraces all that portion of the State lying east of the Cascade range of mountains, and is to-day comparatively a new country, and adapted above any other country in the West to stock raising; it abounds in thousands of acres of the finest grazing lands, with a climate exceedingly mild for the lattitude. Horses, cattle and sheep do well in this section of the State. I never knew a careful stock man to go into Eastern Oregon with, say a hundred head of cattle, or sheep, or a few good brood mares, to remain five years, but came away rich. It is and must continue for years to be the great stock co[illegible] West. Many thousands [illegible] region to Kansas City and Chicago, the great stock markets. This may appear strange, but nevertheless is true. Stock men from the West make their annual visits to these vast stock fields of bunch grass to supply their markets. And truly they come not in vain. Southern Oregon is the most diversified in its resources of any of these divisions. It embraces all that portion of the State lying South of the Umpqua and Calapooia mountains, comprising the Umpqua country and the rich and fertile valley of the Rogue river. This part of the State is noted for its mineral resources and stock raising—especially for sheep—together with its vast forests of unexplored timber lands, abounding with the finest water and climate in the State. In fact I know of no country more inviting to the poor man than is afforded in this favored section. An energetic man may here turn his attention successfully either to mining, sheep raising or lumbering along the coast. The commodious harbors of Coos bay and Port Orford are situated on the coast of this section of the State, from whence come to your lumber yards the finest lumber in the world. The coal interest of this section is very rich. Thousands of tons being annually shipped to this city from Empire City on Coos bay. The agricultnral lands of the valley of the Rogue river, while they are more limited than in the great Willamette valley, of which presently I will speak, are very rich; being peculiarly adapted to rye, barley, oats, potatoes, and fruits of all description, with a climate unrivalled. Could there be a country more inviting for the weary emigrant seeking a home? I come now to Western Oregon, which comprises the famous Willamette valley and its tributaries. I am conscious that my powers are inadequate to describe this vast agricultural garden. This term is used in no exaggerated sense. The richness and beauty of the Willamette valley simply beggars description. It embraces the whole of Western Oregon, and, as an agricultural and fruit country, has no superior in the world, with a climate unsurpassed. The cereals grow in this section of the State to a perfection that is surprising—yielding from 40 to 60 bushels of wheat to the acre, while the fruits are superior to those of any other in the United States. It is not possible to do justice to this part of the State in a single letter. I can only allude to it. The Willamette valley is capable of sustaining alone from its own virgin richness a population of five millions of people, and never feel the strain; for its bountiful crops are never failing and never ending. Its population is healthy, thrifty and happy. This fact alone proves the truth of the statement that Oregon is the most favored State in the Union. Various railroads are projected to connect Oregon with the Pacific roads and the railroads of the Eastern States, notable among which are the Oregon and California Railroad, running directly south from Portland to Roseburg in the Umpqua Valley, its present terminus, a distance of 200 [illegible]. It touches the principal towns in Oregon. It is hoped at no distant day it will be pushed on to the California line; the Oregon Central Railroad running from Portland south, forming a junction with the first named road at Junction City in Lane County. This, however, is in course of construction; the Willamette Valley and Coast Railroad, now being constructed from Corvallis to the Yaquina Bay in Benton county. This, it is proper to say, is one of the most important roads in course of construction in the State, as it pushes through direct from the centre of the Willamette Valley to the sea, where ships of the largest tonnage can ride at anchor. More than 400 miles of sea voyage will be saved by this road. Oregon is singularly free from all local disturbances occasioned by a discontented population, with a taxation so light that one hardly feels the burdens of Government. Its State debt is a mere bagatelle that alarms nobody. While its State administration is notably free from jobs, malfeasance and corruption. The purity of its administration has ever been guarded with care. Its public men have been among the ablest in the West, and to their efforts in and out of Congress, the State is not a little indebted to its present thrifty, contented and happy lot. The most prominent of these are Generals Lane and Nesmith, Senators Grover and Slater, Ex-Sena[illegible] Whiteaker. I give [illegible] John facts for the benefit of my State.

L. VINEYARD.

A CRASHING OF ICEBERGS.

Yesterday afternoon the oldest inhabitant about Salem was heard to remark "this beats Oregon." In the forty years that I have lived on this coast I have never seen anything like this before, save on the plains of the Platt." About 6 P. M. a dark cloud came down from the East preceded with frequent claps of thunder and an ominous roar, soon the storm burst upon the city. Immense hail stones or small icebergs came crashing down like the breaking loose of a glacier over the edge of a precipice, so to speak, and the rain poured after "Noachian" style. For more than thirty minutes the storm raged with unabated fury. Rivers of water rushed through the streets; the skylights in all the buildings in the city were utterly demolished including those in the State House on the flat roofs—secured no protection against the deluge of water. The hail fell to the depth of two inches. One fragment of an iceberg was weighed and found to tip one hundred and sixty grains, and this was not the largest. Fortunately the storm was not accompanied with high winds, and it was not general over the valley; apparently confined to a narrow belt. Had it been general it would have resulted in great injury to the crops.

Following are the losses and damages: L. S. Bates, picture, frames and machines, $200; S. Friedman, dry goods, $500; R. H. Dearborn, harness and saddlery, all the hardware and leather stock, about $800; J. W. Gilbert, boots and shoes, $359; Ben. Strang, tin store, $150; J. H. Haas, jeweler, all tools wet; not much damage only trouble of cleaning; Plamondon & Stimpson, saloon, billiard table wet, and some cigars can't tell amount of injury; J. W. Weatherford & Co. all shelf goods, herbs, and such goods in bulk that could be damaged by water, estimated at about $1,500; Murphy & Crossman, show window goods about $200; C. Uzafovage, boot and shoes, $200; Strong & Bain, new store, light; Louis Byrne some goods damaged, $50. Chemeketa hotel, $500; G. W. Gray, $500; Idaho saloon, $50; Farra Bros, $250; Stewart's building, $300.

There are several other places which we could not get and can't form no idea of the losses.—[Statesman.
