GLACIERS AND RED SNOW. In a letter from Visalia in the Rural Press, signed "J. W. A. W.," we take the following interesting points. A LIVING GLACIER. Few of our citizens have traveled as extensively in the Sierra Nevada of our district as has Mr. Dusy, especially in the regions surrounding Mt. Goddard (14,000 ft.) on the head-waters of the middle fork of Kings river and the south fork of the San Joaquin. He describes as seen last summer by himself and party, what is more like an Alpine glacier than anything I have seen or heard of in our Sierra, except the living glaciers found by John Muir on Mt. Lyall. It was six miles east of Mt. Goddard, on what may be called the Goddard ridge--the divide between the south fork of Kings. It was a mass of clear, bluish ice, estimated to be 80 ft. thick at its upper or deepest edge, where a vast crevice was found, 10 ft. wide, between it and the snow above it. It was about a mile long, and from 500 to 600 yards wide. On its edges were moraines, composed of shattered slate, which Mr. Dusy describes as forming there the upper portion of the slope. At the lower end was a great mass of this slaty debris, which was being shoved along over a substratum of solid granite. He judged that its movement down the canyon last summer was about ten ft., as that was the width of the deep crevice on the upper edge between the ice and snow. I asked Mr. Dusy if he and his party saw the curious and interesting RED SNOW. His answer was, "nailes of it." By the way, while lately in San Francisco, I had the pleasure of examining with Dr. Harkness, through his strong microscope, the odd and pretty globules of the very small microcopic water plant, "protococcus navalis," which gives to this snow its red or crimson color. We examined what our party brought from the red snow fields of the Kern region, and what Dr. Harkness found last summer on the Wasatch mountains, in Utah. These minute globules appear as round as a ball. The Doctor informs me that they propagate by subdivisions, and that the best way to preserve them for examination under the microscope, is to melt a bucketful of the red snow, let the coloring substance settle, pour off the water and save the red sediment, of which you will have about a tablespoonful. Dry this and it forms a pinkish powder, a few particles of which can be moistened and mounted for the microscope at any time. What I had brought from the mountains had been kept uncorrupted for six months in the water melted from the snow. Some globules from this had retained their red color; others had lost their color but retained their form. Globules Dr. H. had dried, had the brilliant, translucent color of a ruby. Except in richness of color the globules from the two localities were exactly alike in shape, etc., showing, as Dr. H. said, that the plants from the Wasatch and the Sierra are identical, and are, beyond question, the veritable "protococcus navalis" discovered first in the Arctic regions and then in the Alps, and in late years found in abundance on many of the higher mountains of Colorado, Utah and California. Wanted Again. A manly Mormon one evening, as the sun was preparing to set among a select assortment of gold and silver clouds in the western horizon, a manly Mormon, I say, tapped gently at the door of the mansion of the late Reginald Gloverson. The door was opened by Mrs. Susan Gloverson. "Is this the house of the widow Gloverson?" the Mormon asked. "It is," said Susan. "And how many is there of she?" inquired the Mormon. "There is about twenty of her, including me," courteously replied the fair Susan. "Can I see her?" "You can." "Madame," he softly said, addressing the twenty disconsolate widows, "I have already twenty-five wives whom I respect and tenderly care for; I can truly say that I never felt love's holy thrill till I saw thee! Be mine, be mine!" he enthusiastically cried, "and we will show the world a striking illustration of the beauty and truth of the noble lines, only a good deal more so-- 'Twenty-one souls with a single thought, Twenty-one hearts that beat as one.' They were united, they were--Artemus Ward.

PROSPECTOR'S CASTLES IN THE AIR. It is at this season that the old forty-niner begins to talk of spots once known to him in California. Every spring he speaks of these hot places; but they bear particularly heavy on his mind when, as is the case this season, there has been a great fall of snow, and water will be tumbling down every ravine. He probably did not think much about the spot when he was on the ground--probably did not prospect it at all--but as soon as he was out of reach of it the place began to work in his brain like yeast in a batch of dough, and time, more than distance, adds to the ferment. He can now see at the distance of 200 miles and after the lapse of thirty years, that in that certain little nook lies the fortune he has always missed securing. He wants to go back there, and he always tells you he will go back; not this spring, however; he can't go this spring, but next, or at least in two or three years. You can't pick up an old Californian who has not treasured up in his memory, such a hot place. He dreams of it both by day and by night, and of the two his dreams by night are probably the saner. That spot gives him comfort--is his comfort and stay. While he has it he still has hope. He can see the place just as he left it, and he is always sure that no human feet have measured or human eyes rested upon the ground since he turned his back upon it. The chances are that not one in ten of the ancient miners could go within a mile of the places they dream of, and even though they should reach the very spot, the ground would doubtless be found so torn up and dug over that an angel from the realms above could not recognize it. It is like a page from the "Arabian Nights" when three or four old forty-niners, each with his mug of beer before him, start in to astonish each other with stories of the good things they knew of the secret places in the old camp of California. Millions of millions are yet resting in these places, and the indications are that their repose will not be disturbed, and that their whereabouts will go down to the grave with the generation who first panned the placers of the Golden State. [Virginia Enterprise. To Young Men. Idleness is the great destroyer of young men. It is sure to work out the ruin of the most talented. Give a young man plenty to do and he is safe. Allow him to spend his hours in idleness--to loaf around bar-rooms--stand on the street corners or stay about home, with no higher ambition than just to eat, drink, sleep and smoke, and you lay for him the broad foundation of future disgrace. Parents, you may depend upon it, that your grown-up boys find little that adds to their manhood in the walks of idleness. Better to give them some honorable trade than to trust to chance for some windfall of luck or fortune to benefit them in after life. If young men are out of employment let this great truth be impressed upon their minds, that time, even though it brings no money, is valuable. Self-improvement should be kept up, so that every spare hour may bring to its possessor some valuable acquisition. Enrich your minds by the careful study of some good work, for you may rest assured your labor is none the less for being intelligent. Better be found studying at home, thereby improving and disciplining your mind, than to be seen on the street corners with hands in pockets, a cigar between your lips--the very picture of laziness. Nothing can be accomplished without labor. Excellence in every trade or profession depends upon it. It is not the idlers that make their mark in the world, but the earnest, go-ahead men who never stop for little troubles or given up for great ones, but who go forward, determined to be, and do something in this world. Young men, turn over a new leaf--place before you the object of your desires and work for it. "Gentlemen of the jury," said a Detroit lawyer, "there were just thirty-six hogs in the drove; just three times as many as are in that jury-box, gentlemen." And he lost the case because of his love of mathematical clearness.
