

THROUGH TO JACKSONVILLE.
We take the following from a communication published in the "Oregonian," written by Fred V. Holman, who was here not long since:
We arrived at Rock Point, in Jackson county, at 3 o'clock in the morning. It was a long and dreary waiting for 7 o'clock to come—the hour that we were to leave for Jacksonville. As it grew light we saw that we were near Rogue river. It is a beautiful, small river, not navigable, running between banks of solid rock. A little rain had fallen during the night and laid whatever dust the sun of the few preceding days had made. Rock Point is thirteen miles only from Jacksonville. The road is good and the country quite level. A large part of the way the stage road runs on the eastern slope of the mountains. As you ride along you get a fine view of the Rogue river valley—for its size the most beautiful and richest valley in Oregon. The small groves of tall and well shaped pines, the wide spreading oaks, and that shapely and beautiful tropical looking evergreen, the madroño, relieve what would else be a monotonous level plain. The valley has the appearance of being entirely surrounded by high mountains. Far in the east is Mt. Pitt, a snow peak similar in shape and of the apparent size of Mt. St. Helens, as seen from South Portland. "All along here," says the driver, pointing with his whip to some meadows, "was the first mining done in the valley, and plenty of gold could be taken out now if they had water only for hydraulic mining."
Jacksonville is a charming little place built on a hill side. Here was found some of the richest places in Oregon. Back of the town are evidences of the flush times of long ago. But for the lack of water mining would be very profitable within the town limits even now. The town has a thrifty, substantial look. More of the business firms are in brick buildings than in wooden ones.
The people of Jacksonville are a whole-souled, generous, open-hearted people, glad to see strangers who do not come here to run the town. They have that frank and manly way usually found in the mining districts of the Pacific coast, a way which came from the kind of men who settled and mined when money was plenty and cowardice and meanness unknown. Jacksonville and her citizens have been without many of the luxuries of other places, but she has not some of the vices which other places have got among their luxuries. The only means of reaching here so far have been over the wagon roads. Freights have been high. The people are anxiously waiting for the sound of the locomotive, that open sesame of all isolated inland places.
Most of the soil in the valley is very fine, but there are sterile spots, usually surrounded by the richest black loam, looking so much as though it were half gunpowder that one almost fears to throw down a lighted match.
As I passed a field with several hundred bushels of wheat growing, and in the very best condition, I asked a man repairing a fence whether the land yielded well. He said: "Last year there were in wheat 60 acres only, but it yielded 3,000 bushels, which I saw measured myself."
In many places large fields of alfalfa are growing. It needs to be planted but once, and there is a volunteer crop forever after. It is a foot high now. I am told that it averages three crops a year. There is no place in Oregon so well adapted for dairy farming. Before many years I believe that Rogue river butter will have the call in the Portland market if the farmers here will take the trouble to make first-class butter. They have the soil, feed and climate, their own industry is the only other requisite.
There is no place in Oregon better adapted for fruit raising. Peaches, grapes, apples, cherries, strawberries and other small fruits are said to have a size and flavor which cannot be excelled. The only orchards of any size in the valley now are of apple trees. It seems almost too bad that they did not, several years ago, start large orchards of peach trees in anticipation of the coming of the railroad. It is not too late now. This valley cannot raise too many peaches, for all that are not used as fresh fruit will be taken by the canneries. It is said that the peaches here are far better than any grown in California and rival even the Delaware peaches.
In the suburbs of Jacksonville are vineyards having together an aggregate of 25 acres. The market has been so limited for fresh grapes that most of them have been made into wine. The owners evidently have not yet learned to make the grape into its best wine. I tasted some white wine which was a light very dry wine, quite palatable. But a red wine which is here called claret—well, I pass. It is said, however, that a good article of grape brandy is made here.

Jacksonville has a population of about 1,000. It is not likely that it will ever be a place of any great size. It was built up mainly by the stimulus of placer mining. It is on one side of the valley, and has no especial facilities for manufactures although there is a good steam grist mill and a distillery here, while Ashland, 15 miles away has good water power. The Rogue river valley is not large—say 15 miles wide 20 miles long. These would be its extreme dimensions. The foundation is now laying here for a new court house to cost $30,000. The building will be finished this year. There are three churches. The Presbyterians have a new church, one of the neatest and most tasteful buildings I have seen in any of the small towns in Oregon. The Methodists also have a church, while the Catholics have a church and a girls' boarding school, all clean, nice looking buildings. There also is a fine public school building with a good school in it. To save the town from the reputation of being too goodly I will mention that there are several saloons here. Jacksonville is very orderly indeed and I notice a very pleasant lack of hoodlumism. Still, if outsiders come here for the purpose of taking the town and setting it to rights, they are likely to fail in their amateur missionary labor. There are a number of very handsome dwellings here several being brick. Take it all in all, Jacksonville is a clean thrifty looking place, and a citizen of it need not be ashamed to claim it as his residence. There are two papers here, the "Times," (dem.), and the "Sentinel," (rep.), both party organs, but each good local papers. I notice a commendable lack of the celebrated "Oregon style" in their allusions to each other.
Most of the farmers are men who came here early in the fifties or before and live on their own donation land claims. Most of the farmers have on them good houses and barns. The fences are good and show that they are well attended to. Heretofore but small crops have been raised, for the want of market. But from this on Rogue river valley will be known in the market. While all the temptations to idleness—a rich soil and limited market—the whole valley shows for itself that its farmers are thrifty, industrious men, who need but a market to be as prosperous and well to do as in any section of the state.
From its natural beauty and delightful climate it will not be many years until tourists will find that the Rogue river valley is one of the most charming spots on the whole Pacific coast
