A Jacksonville Composition.

The following composition was written by Willie Miller a twelve year old pupil in the second department of our public school. The subject was "What the man in the moon sees as he passes over Jacksonville." The composition was written extempore as a part of the regular school work:

He sees a little town at the foot of mountains, since there are mountains on the north, south and west while on the east there is a beautiful little valley. And of course, he sees a school house on a little height and he hears the bell if he lingers long enough to listen. And he sees some church spires, some brick and frame buildings, the roofs of many houses, the tops of may trees, gardens with their plants, the fields with their grain, corn and other plants. On Christmas night he peeps down the chimney and sees us patiently waiting waiting for the dawn, not all wishing it to come as much as others do because they do not get any christmas gifts. I wonder if he sees us drink the sparkling water and sees some men drink beer or whisky. And does he see all things at night or not, but I believe he does if he has good eves. But there might be some mistake about that for all I know.
