

COIL OIL JOHNNY'S LECK.
HE RECOVERS $25,000 THROWN ASIDE FIFTEEN YEARS AGO.

A Harriburg special to the New York "World" says: John McNulty better known as Johnny Steele, or "Coil Oil Johnny," who made a large fortune during the oil fever and squandered it almost as fast as he made it, turned up in this city on the Fourth. He said that he had come to celebrate, and that he was at the present time working in McCormick's mills, in New Cumberland. He pulled out a bundle of papers from his pocket and handing of them to an auditor, said it was a claim, to the Continental Hotel in Philadelphia, for which he had paid $480,000 in his wealthy days. He asserted that the hotel would again come into his possession. The paper reads right enough and bears the earmarks of age about it. He further stated that he was prospecting in New Cumberland, sinking shafts for copper and iron. He showed some ores which he said came from the shafts in which he was experimenting. He expressed his confidence that he would become as wealthy as Vanderbilt yet. Being asked where his family was he said that they were in Waymart, and added that he had recently sent them $25,000. He had been up in Williamsport, he said, about six months ago, and happened to be at the Crawford House. Somebody was talking about a package containing $25,000, "left there by a fellow named Coal Oil Johnny about '65 or '66 to remain there until called for. He went to the bank and succeeded, after some difficulty in establishing his identity, in obtaining the money. Coal Oil Johnny is still quite attractive in appearance. His face is pleasant and genial, and well browned by the sun and weather. His eyes are blue and he wears side-whiskers in the English fashion. His clothes are old fashioned and much too heavy for the weather. Bundles of papers hang loosely out of his pocket. He is 69 years of age and possesses considerable intelligence, being able to write his name legibly, a feat he could not perform in the days of his prosperity. He is hunting for evidence to get back some of the money which was illegally taken away from him. When the oil fever broke out in northern Pennsylvania, about twenty-two years ago, McNulty owned twenty acres of land in Venango county which he had cleared for himself. Strangers came one day and began to prospect around the neighborhood. What was an ordinary appearance to him was very extraordinary to them. The prospectors looked at the water was a familiar thing to him. He had seen the sight often and did not mind it. To the strangers it was a hidden treasure. The more they looked over the farm the more they wanted it. This led to negotiations, and McNulty wakened up one morning to find himself the possessor of $8,000,000. His farm of twenty acres composed the heart of the newly-discovered oil field, and from that time forth he became known as "Coil Oil Johnny." This turned his head. His reckless extravagancies are a matter of history. He scattered money around wherever he went. He purchased the Continental Hotel, Philadelphia, furnished a colored band with gorgeous suits and solid silver instruments, bought elegant turn-outs at a fabulous price, used them for a single ride and then gave them away. He traveled from city to city and wherever he went he was followed by a crowd of sharers who flocked to his wealth. Enormous sums of his fortune was, it could not stand these drains made upon it, and when it had disappeared Coal Oil Johnny went to work to retrieve his fortunes in a many way. The story of the past fifteen years, from the time when he took a situation with John Sherry's New York theatre at $6 a week salary, to the present time, is a story of genuine American pluck and perseverance, and his friends, and he has many proved and tried foul-weather friends, will be glad to know that he is once more on the road to prosperity.
