

Couldn't Trust The Court.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE BY A RAILWAY TICKET AGENT.

Chief Justice Waite of the Supreme Court had a funny experience the other day, and as he has related it to any number of friends, the story has had wide circulation in society. Several weeks ago he had an imperative engagement in Baltimore. Like all great men, he is proverbially absent-minded. He went up to the court and after a few moments session, adjourned the court and came down leisurely to the Baltimore and Ohio depot, which is only a short distance from the capitol. As he got out of the street car he found he had ten minutes in which to purchase a ticket and get a seat on the train. As he went up to the ticket office he discovered, to his surprise, that he only had a few pennies in his pocket. He had neglected to provide himself with "scrip" for his journey. He looked around the waiting room, but saw no one he knew. What was to be done must be done quickly; his engagement was an important one. So he fled up in a line to the ticket office, and when he reached the window the chief justice smiled an awful smile across the full width of his ample mouth, and asked the agent if he knew him.

"No, I don't," snarled the agent, "and what is more, I don't want to know who you are!"

"I want a ticket to Baltimore and return. I am the chief justice of the supreme court, and I have no money with me; it is purely accidental. I can give you my personal check."

"Oh I know you. I know all the bloods, but that dodge won't work on me. I have just had two members of the cabinet try to 'bilk' me out of tickets, and no chief justice gets me. Take your ugly mug out of the window and get out of the way of people who have money."

The chief justice glared. He could not find the young man for contempt of court. He felt cheaper and worse than if he had been a real fraud. He blushed and perspired so that the agent had his firm belief strengthened. The chief justice dashed out of the station to see if he could not find some one to identify him. He had only five minutes left. It was to short a time to the capitol. He saw no one. Across the street there was a saloon and eating house. The chief justice made a dash across the road, but he stopped at the door. What if he should be seen going into a common gin mill? What would people say, and it was a bare chance if any one in there should know him! Spying a private entrance he rushed in and accosted the proprietor with the frantic inquiry of "Do you know me?"

"Yes, bet yer head I do, yer honor, said the short haired, freckle faced man behind the bar. "Ye are the boss at the supreme court. I see ye every day going by here on the cars."

"Will you cash my check?" I have no time to explain. Here the justice grabbed a piece of paper on the desk near by and began to write hurriedly.

"Shure I will. I've seen odder byes off on a tear before get out of money. Trust me, sorr. Is it $20 ye want? Here it is. Will ye have a drop before ye run?"

But before any further explanation could be made the chief justice had grabbed the money and was running across the street. In some way the ticket agent had learned of his blunder during the judge's absence, and was all politeness when he saw the money. Waite barely made the train, but he has not had such a shock to his dignity since he went upon the bench to the supreme court.

"The Smell of It."

An Irishman was recently installed in a Boston oil store as a roller of barrels and a pumper of the slippery fluid into casks and cans. He is apt and bright and has made himself useful and familiar with the store and its equipments, and among other things, the telephone. He is sometimes trusted to answer calls through that instrument. Saturday morning Pat was busy as usual, and for the moment everybody else was absent, when the telephone bell sounded. Pat wiped his oily hands and took up the sounder. He soon got the name of the person desiring to speak with the firm. A sample of certain number and grade of fish oil was wanted. Pat stepped to the shelf and got a pail, then back to the telephone and shouted:

"Here it is!"

"But send it over," came back through the instrument; "we can't tell whether it will suit us till we see it."

Here was a dilemma. Pat could not leave the store to carry the sample of oil over. But his ready Irish wit was equal to the occasion. He uncorked the bottle, held it up close to the transmitter and shouted:

"And can't ye tell by the smell of it?"
