

The Late Clinton Schieffelin.

A CARD TO THE PUBLIC BY REV. J. W. ELLIS.

This sad event which has brought such great sorrow to the heart of a family and cast a gloom over the community, is relieved by the fact that it was the result of an accident. Any one with the opportunity of the writer to investigate may be readily convinced that the death of the late Clinton Schieffelin was the result of an accident, which might happen to any one. That it was not even momentary insanity is apparent from the fact that he spent the preceding evening aiding the youngest son in the family in his mathematical studies, and was more than usual cheerful and happy, and slept all night soundly, and not to exceed five minutes preceding his death talked intelligently to his wife about the state of his health; and was in the act of dressing for breakfast when the accident occurred.

That it was not financial of domestic causes is assured by the fact that his business manager assures us that his affairs were in the most satisfactory condition, as Mr. S. well knew having talked the matter over the day preceding his death.

It has been but a short time since his sister left, after making a long visit with him, during which time he was in excellent spirits.

His immediate family, in every sense, were a source of gladness rather than of sadness to a father. Their social and business relations to the community are of the best, to which he had made reference only the day previous to his death. As a husband and father he was loved and treated with the respect due his relation to each and all. These are facts well known to myself.

The circumstances show conclusively that it was an accident. The revolver was one left in the house by an absent son, which the deceased had never used, nor was he familiar with such weapons. The late burglary in the vicinity led him to provide against a surprise, and so he purchased some cartridges, loaded the weapon and placed it under his pillow. Mrs. S., being timid, removed it to the stand drawer without his notice or knowledge. On the morning of his death he had occasion to open the drawer for some medicine, and in the early twilight was surprised to lay his hand upon the weapon. The stand and bed are so close together that when the body fell the space would not admit of the prostrate form, but left it in a bowed state. Surprised by touching the weapon he seems to have stooped to look into the drawer, at the same time lifting the weapon. The attitude of his head was such as to bring it in the line of the muzzle of the weapon, which was a self priming revolver, and being unfamiliar with it the discharge was accidental and the result fatal. The facts relieve the family, friends and community of this best deep sorrow. It is but an act of justice to the memory of the dead that these facts be made public.

Longfellow's Grave.

Longfellow has no tombstone, no mound, no memorial. We found his grave by the number of the lot. The whole place is smoothly sodded and surrounded by a stone coping. It is on a terrace. One side of the lot runs almost perpendicularly down to a lower road. The place seems fitted naturally for a vault, but only a bank of green met the eye on the deep hillside. Unmarked as it was, it was surrounded by visitors—young and old, home people and strangers. No need to ask, no need to tell who was Longfellow.

There were people there from beyond the Rockies, and they gathered the grass-blades to take back with them; a schoolboy treasured a sorrel blossom that grew by the way; and the very dust of the carriage road, I believe, would have been prized because it had been near to him, to the body that had dwelt with "that beautiful spirit," whose fame his friend Emerson in his feebleness had forgotten, but whose beauty death-shadows could not dim.

On our way home we passed in front of the queer yellow house, rather weather-beaten and dilapidated, that had so long been Longfellow's home. The great trees, the shrub thickets, were just as he had described them. I could fancy the old clock ticking "Never! forever!" on the mansion stair; the chestnut chair empty, and by it the jeweled pen that "Helen" gave him; the books of manuscript verse all neatly tucked in their corners; the souvenirs of friends looking down from the walls of the ancient dwelling. We did not ask to enter the house. The master had too lately departed to have it seem like his home without him.
