

on down through all the subsequent stages of the world to the present time. He has lived from the age of the original dog-out canoe on our rivers to the magnificent steamboat of today; from the pole cabin, with the weight pole roof to the grand and pretentious bay-window palace; from the bull-tongue and the wooden mould-board plow to the bright and sparkling sulky; from the dale and threshing floor of wild horses to the powerful and giant like steam thrasher; from the sickle and the scythe and the grain cradle to the broad and sweeping header; from the old spinning wheel and hand loom and leather breeches and home made clothes made by hand with a whang or needle to the great factory with its thousand spindles and battalions of lightning looms and to store clothes made of the finest fabric on the wonderful sewing machine; from the pack mule and sled and yoke of oxen as the means of transportation to the great railroad train; from the log school house with the dirt floor to the painted school house, the academy, the college and the university; from galloping seven hundred and fifty miles on horse back through mud and storms, from Sacramento to Portland, to secure a business transaction to the instantaneous transaction by the magnetic telegraph; from a broad expanse of country without roads, or bridges, or fences, or houses, or villages or cities anywhere in sight to a country fully advanced to the fore front of civilization, with its roads, and bridges, and fences and lanes and houses, and villages and cities spread out every where you look; and with its gardens, and orchards, and meadows, and grain fields, and corn fields, and vineyards and hop yards; and, with its State fairs and county fairs, and newspapers, and churches, and theatres, and saloons, and horse races; and, finally, with its thousands and thousands of gay, happy and joyous people, rushing up and down everywhere; beautiful in complexion in features, forms; and in and, splendidly dressed and ornamented with snow white laces, and bright flowers and ribbons gleaming and sparkling with every ray of the rainbow! All this in order of time, in fact and in incident he has lived and realized. It is said that Methuselah lived 969 years; but, he died thousands of years before the discovery of steam, the utility of electricity or the mystery of the telephone; whereas, the pioneer has lived it all, from the age of Adam down through the accomplishment of all the wonders to the present day, so that Methuselah, old as he was, died in his infancy as compared with the sum of life of the Oregon pioneer.

And it is a matter of congratulation and encouragement, for now, and for the time to come, to remember, that the pioneers, both ancient and modern, in this high world of science and mind have been even more distinguished and renowned than the explorers and pioneers of the physical globe. It is in fact the superior sphere. Figuratively speaking, its mountains are loftier, its canyons deeper, its forests denser, and its plains and oceans spread out in every direction, boundlessly to all infinity. It embraces all mind, all principles and all forces. In this occult sphere man has made his most invaluable discoveries, and from it obtained his most invaluable possessions. From it he has derived the means that have enabled him to subdue the earth, and utilize and appropriate to his safety, comfort, happiness and joy the advantages fruits and resources of the physical world.

And, finally, from this profound and mysterious domain, founded in the infinity of the universe, has been revealed to man, through the patience and diligence of the devotees of science and thought, the knowledge of his mathematical and philosophical instruments; his powerful, effective and untiring energy, his utilization of the geometry of motion in all the vast and varied machinery, which man has invented and made; his perception and comprehension of the laws and principles involved in natural phenomena; the wonderful and astounding effects of analysis and synthesis in the elements of matter, and the infinity of invaluable qualities, properties and forces that may be herein involved; and, over and above all that there is an attainable rationale—an equity and justice, existing in, and as a prime part of the nature of things, and which is of, and pertains to the conduct, government, and progress of all intelligences in their physical, mental, moral and social being and life.

Ladies and gentlemen: We have now taken a brief survey of the phenomenal history of our race; its exploration, emigrations, conquests, investigations and achievements. When we consider all these things, and the grand progress that man has made, we behold him, to-day, able, through the mysterious power of mind over material things to assert a sway in the world, more than commensurate with that ascribed to the ancient Jupiter. And, yet, verily, with all these grand and sublime achievements he has made, he but stands, now, at the threshold of the creation of God. The real conquest of the world is only just begun. Not the conquest of violence and blood shed, but the peaceful conquest of superior knowledge—superior example. The superior progress, is prosperity and happiness of a free country, and liberty, shall teach and prove to mankind the utter fallacy of all despotic forms of government, all aristocracies and all monopolies on earth. It shall be, in fact, the high ambition of our American race to pioneer and lead all mankind in the solution of the great problems of this life—as the maintenance of the right and justice; the advancement enlargement and protection of business and industry; and, the true and equitable distribution of the fruits, or joint production, of labor and capital; and, the general and safe diffusion of all the blessings of the world. And, thus maintain the even tenor of our way until the adjacent States shall petition for annexation that they may be permitted to come in, and be a part of the great family; and, participate in the general prosperity happiness and joy. Such shall be the high ambition cherished by the descendants of the old pioneers; and, maintained by them and their descendants until rational government, justice and freedom triumph over the whole earth; and, on to the coming time when crowns and sceptres, and all symbols of despotism, shall be converted into flower pots, bird nests and children's play things as the mere relic of the barbarism of the by gone days!

W. M. BYBEE,
Agent, or

But when we come seriously to contemplate the fact that westward the Star of empire shall no longer take its way. That after so many ages of western progress this bright star is destined, for the future, here, for ever to rest, it cannot but be natural for us to anticipate that every descendant of the old pioneers, from the force of their hereditary instincts, will sigh for new worlds to be found; and, inately regret the limited and globular plan of the world; and, from a sensation of restless discontent feel that it would have suited them better if the physical universe had been projected, infinitely, in every direction upon a single plan. That there should simply have been a continuous succession of valleys, and hills, and plains, and mountains, and lakes and rivers, and forests, and seas, world without end.
But such not being the plan, the ambitious descendant of the old pioneer is forced—providentially forced, to fall back upon philosophy in order to realize the true situation and the high duties and obligations coming upon him in his day and generation. He cannot repeat the career of his ancestors; he is compelled to direct his energy and ambition to still higher fields of attainment and achievement. He cannot afford to seek vent to his energy and enterprise in wars and invasions; nor can he tolerate the barbarism of military achievement or renown beyond the strict bounds of the defence of his home and country. He must, therefore, perceive that the universe is founded in certain inexorable necessities as space, duration, area and abstract; and, that each of these parts, are indispensable to the others; and that, beyond space, time and matter, the abstract—the metaphysical, or immaterial is the grandest, and most important part of the world in the widest possible signification of that term. This we designate, allegorically, for the great purposes of the future, as the next new world, and to it, as a boundless field for exploration and conquest we would, respectfully, call the attention of our ambitious successors.
The existence of this abstract world, to which our attention is now directed, is a knowledge, co-equal with our remotest traditions of the existence of man. It comes to us, however, from the earliest times in very indefinite form, like the knowledge of the existence of the new continent of the physical world was known to the ancients ten thousand years before the age of Plato. We know, that prior to the more extended exploratory voyages and expeditions up and down the physical world, that the most extravagant conjectures and imaginings prevailed. The more distant regions, in every direction, were inhabited, by a robust imagination, with horrid monsters, both man and animals, and both natural and supernatural. As the bold and rugged explorer and pioneer of the physical world, has been the efficient missionary; driving out and annihilating its monsters and myths. So have a class of thinkers and philosophers, also, as explore and pioneers from age to age dispelling the distorted creations of imagination and leading mankind to a knowledge of the truth, and the actual possibilities in this mystic world from whence demonstrative knowledge and the sciences are derived.
