It is said that the old man buried his face in his hands, upon the receipt of the information, and wapt like a child. It must have been torture that blustered the soul as a red hot iron would the flesh, and probably that as keenly as he must have felt his downfall before, he never had such a clear sight of his utter wretchedness as he had through the scalding tears that coursed down his cheeks. To him the meaning of the way of the trans gressor is hard, was plain enough. such experience almost excites a sympathy in the heart that prompts one to say, black as have been his deeds, let him go, and leave him to be scourged by his own remorse. But ne, that will not do. He deliberately walked into the fire with his eyes wide open. As an experienced financier, he enered into the flimsiest financial bub ile that was ever blown through a Wall street pipe. He knew, if be knew anything, that the end was disaster, and could only have hoped and expected that in some way he could crawl from beneath the wreck under which others must be buried. J. D. Fish knew very well that everybody interested in the swindle could not ome out whole. He could not help knowing it. But when the crash came his experienced banker and man well versed in the ways of the world, attempted and still at tempts to throw the blame upon Ward, a more boy, though old in villinny, and who was enabled to do the damage he did only the assistance and connivance of Fish. There is no doubt at all that Fish is just where he ought to be and should have been years ago.
