The question of "What to do with 'Our Boys," has of late been greatly agitated, but the conundrum seems to les as far from a satisfactory solution as ever. There is an old but trite say ing that, "Those who never were fath ers know best how to manage their "children." There is more truth than sportry in that statement. Every schild is but the advance of the man to came, and every man is essentially from all other men. To say what we shall do with our boys, to lay down any sweeping rules for their management, would be as ridiculous as to lay out a certain line of conduct and com pel every man to follow it. Boys should have a volition of their own. It would be a wrong to them to parcel them out and say to these, "You must study for professions." The remedy for the hoodlum element is not in compelling them, after they have grown up in an outdoor school of vice, to learn a trade. It is rather in making his home too pleasant for outside influence. If parents would teach their children to remain at home from the beginning, and devote a little time towards their pleasure and comtort, and spend a little money in providing that their sons with material for amusement at home they would not care to go abroad. There is no boy bern into the world who does not before he is five years old, exhibit the natural bent of his mind. Let the parents then under stand that, and provide him with books or tools as the case may be. If boys were rightly understood, when very small and their natural inclina tions fostered, we should not have to make the great mistake of placing them to learn some trade for which they were utterly unsuited, and at which they would not work. Their choice would be made, and they would unconsciously acquire a certain degree of knowledge of what they would like before they were placed as apprentices to something which, when understood, would be distasteful. Every boy ought to have a chance to learn the trade he profers and for which he has a natural taste, no matter what the condition of his parents. This is not for boys of to-day who are almost men, but for those of to morrow who are still under their mother's jurisdiction. A few dollars more or less, a little more noise about the house, is all the price she has to pay for the privilege of fu ture years of happiness with her grown up boys. With the mother rests the greatest share of the respon sibility of the character of her children. Home influences, when good are mers powerful than all others. Every woman has it in her power to make home an abode of pure delight to her boys, and to keep them there from the evils of the street. In that alone rest the solution of the query of "What shall we do with our boys?"-"Budget."

The debate in the Senate over the Edward's resolution demanding that the executive make public any papers which may be on file regarding the suspension or appointment of officials in the civil service during the recess of congress, hale drought to the surface the latent talent of that body, which once claimed as members, Daniel Webster, Henry Clay and John C. Calboun. This is not an age of eloquence; that was an epoch of our past history.
