Death of the Oldest Sporting Man in the State of Oregon.

Several months ago, a laughable If the Portland folks really want to MILLER story appeared in these columns, telling how the veteran hero of many a hardfought battle with the "tiger," went around once in early days at Jackson conville, to collect money among his brother "sports," for the purpose of building a Methodist church for the Rev. Isaac Driver to preach in. That sporting man was Addison Helms. who died in Jacksonville on the 4th inst. after several years of s'ow decline.

"Old Ad," as be was called by everybody, frem Tehama to the the canyon of the Umpqua, was a gambler and a horse trainer; and when you said that you saidfall that could be said against him. In his younger days, before his health failed bim, Ad was a noted Indian fighter, as brave as a lion and made every man keep a civil tongue in his head. He was generous as a town pump and never knew the value of money. His word was his bond and he was a man of nice sense of honor. He gave freely and without ostentation. We recollect one little incident in Jacksonville in the summer of 1859, which almost brings tears to our eves as we recall it. We had sold the well known race horse "Wake up Jake" to W. K. Ish of Jacksonville to say what tunes shall be played. for $600, his previous owner being "Buck" Harrigan of Sacramento. We took the horse from Sacramento to Yreka, to deliver him to Mr. Ish, who insisted on continuing the trip to Jack senville. We stayed there three days and one of the first men we fell up ing machine and run it by steam. against was Addison Helms, then stalwart, fine-looking man offices that forty years. He introduced us to Bill Gird and Jim Clugg-ge, and then the wagon was full. Champaigne flowed like water for about twenty hours. On the second day of the hard-going, Helms espied Worthington Tiswell, who afterwards trained Rifleman for the Welchs at Red Bluff. "Old Tiz" had the happy knack of getting drunk in seventeen different languages and was then in his normal condition of "Say, Gird, you go up on the balcony of the State's Hotel and get a bucke; full. Now, Tom, you go over and tell old Tiz that you have leased Owen Dale's running qualities from Williamson and you want him to train the horse for a four-mile race. He will strike you for money and then you make believe to come over here and borrow it of me. He will start to follew you and about that time he'll get the grand souse." We did as we were told and had barely engaged Tiswell to train the big son of Maria Downing, when he said he would like to have about $60. We told him that was more money than we had, but we would draw on Sacramento and get the money from Cluggage in the stage office. We started across the street and had hardly slone so when old Tiz followed us. He had scarcely crossed the curbstone when he was nearly knocked flat with a deluge from the upper veranda of the United States Hotel; and before he could regain his feet, here was Gird standing over him, enquiring, "My God, what does all this mean."

"Old Tiz" is dead years ago, and now Ad's gone, too. Gird lives on his farm in Benton county and is rarely seen on a track nowadays. There were worse men in the world than Ad Helms. His fault was in his avocation, while his merits were all his own. His honesty was never called in question and his liberality was the only thing that kept him poor. The past winter pulled him down a good deat and he coughed considerably as he hobbled about with his heavy cane. Summer came, but the old hero of Hungry Hill never rallied as the days grew warm. At last came the natal day of the nation and the sun shone down, fierce and hot, on the ground where, thirtyone years ago, Ad Helms had stood with rifle in hand and picked off the murderous savages who had been slaughtering defenceless women and ebildren for weeks. Now all was peace, and across hill and vale floated said day, at the court flouse door in Jacksonville, lackson county, Oregon, sell the mellow music for the "day we cele-a over d s-ribed real property to the highbrate."
