

Laid Down Four Trays.

"John," observed Mr. Gasp a few minutes ago to his eldest, "I am sorry to know that you are addicted to that terrible vice of gambling, and only last night it came to my ears that you had lost a large sum of money. To show you that I know this I can tell you the exact amount. Fifty dollars, John. It's a perfect outrage, sir, and I will not endorse it. Now, I want you to tell me just how it occurred, or you can leave my house."

"Well, you see," meekly began Gasp, Jr., "was a little game of draw." "I don't know what you mean, sir, by a 'little game of draw.'" You must remember that your father don't know one card from another, and never did, sir. Do you hear that—never did."

"Well, it was a game of poker." "Go on, sir; go on." "And there were four of us in."

"Horrible! but go on." "And it came a jack, pa." "Proceed, sir, with your disgraceful story."

"And I opened it on three trays." "I don't know what you mean by those slang expressions, but go on."

"And only one of the fellows stayed and he drew three cards, while I only drew two."

"Well, it's all Greek to me, but continue the wretched history."

"When I skinned my hand out I found another tray."

"Yes?" "And bet a dollar."

"Horrible." "And he raised me five."

"Yes?" "Then I raised him five."

"Yes! yes!" "Then he raised me back five."

"Ah!" "And I raised him five."

"Well." "Then he raised me five again."

"Phor!" "And by that time we had both got excited."

"Yes, hurry up." "So I raised him ten."

"You did, hey?" "Yes, sir, and then he raised me ten more."

"Terrible! but go ahead." "Then I raised him five. That made fifty I had in and I felt nervous, but I thought I had him."

"Yes; well, what did he do?" "He raised me back twenty-five."

"What did you do then?" "Then I dropped."

"You did! Why, you miserable idiot, why didn't you call him! Lord, I wish I'd held that hand of yours, I'd have made things hot for him, you bet, if I'd have had to put the last chip. Had four trays and you dropped, when like as not he didn't have more'n a full hand or three of a kind. Great Pater! I wish I'd had that hand, but thank goodness! I never knew one card from another."

The death of Tilden gives a great chance to some man who knows or claims to know all about it to write the secret history of the formation of the electoral commission in 1876-77. While Tilden and David Davis lived no one would have dared to write what might be denied by the two men who knew the most about it, but now there is no restraint and the credulity of his readers is the only limit the author of the book need put on his imagination. That there will be one history goes without saying—probably two or more. The opportunity is too tempting to be let go. John Bigelow will probably write the first book—unless Dana, of the Sun, comes in meanwhile.

CLEVELAND is the only living man nominated by the Democratic party for the presidency since 1856. Hayes is the only living man nominated by the Republican party for the presidency from 1856 to 1884. Blaine is the only defeated presidential candidate alive.
