One of the most important things to be considered by a stranger settling in our midst is the matter of schools. Proximity to schools, length of school terms and quality of instruction given, are elements of prime importance in the selection of a home. So vital are they and so necessary to be considered that no judicious man neglects to inform himself concerning them. To the intending settler, we would say that no rural section of the United States affords better facilities for education than tional interest here has been on the increase during the last ten or fifteen years, until a very desirable standard of excellence has been reached by teachers and is demanded by patrons. He then abandoned it and went about 200 yards farther off and again commenced boring down into the bowels of the earth. At the depth of about 20 feet he again struck the coal bed, and the gases and fumes arising therefrom were so strong that the men were compelled to abandon the work.
