Mr. D. J. S. Pearce, who owns a small but fertile place on Sterling creek, raised in his garden there, during the season of 1886, a patch of excellent and very large cabbage. The cabbages were cut from the stems in the fall and the stumps left standing in the ground. When Mr. Pearce plowed his garden, last spring, he left two of these stumps undisturbed, thinking that as they had produced such fine heads the year before they would, of course, afford him a goodly quantity of most desirable seed. The stumps grow with the opening spring ; but instead of shooting up for seed they set for heads. and in the fall just passed Mr. Pearce took from one stump a fine large head and from the other one he cut two heads, one weighing fifteen pounds and the other ten-a weight of twenty-five pounds, of cabbage from one stump during the second year of its growth.

There is something to consider in the daily expenses for the household necessities, which in the aggregate of the year amount to a good deal. The ethics of buying and selling seem to be for the vendor to get all he can, and for the purchaser to see that he don't get too much. But what is too much? It is almost the purchaser to see that he don't get too much. But what is too much? It is almost a profound question, and presents the strange paradiox thiat the dearest in many things is often the cheapest. Certainly this is so in food where health is involved, and in reme-dies which restore health after it has been impaired. It is certainly so in clothing; for a cheap suit that will hardly last one season is dearer than the one which will last two sea-sons, the difference in price being reasonable. So in shoes, and the like. Recurring to the items of food and health, undoubtedly the most important, it is found that villainous adulteration is what renders it cheaper, in much that is sold, and me are known who have spent thouwards to be cured of disease have suffered years of agony, and have triffed away their substance on worthless remedies. That which is testified to by thousands as be-ing an absolute cure, and perimanetily effica-cious, is cheap at any price in comparison with stich as have no virtue, and which pro-long suffering. A case in point is the follow-ing: "New Bloomfield, Pa., April 29, 1886. The Charles A. Vogeler Co., Baltimere, Md. Gentiemen .-For more than thirty parts i had been afflicted with rheumatian ap severe I had to use morphine to secture rest at night. The point here is not so much what Mr. Bonsall paid for the great remedy for pain, for the price is a mere bagatelle, but that he was cured permanently after thirty years' suffering. Of course the poor must count cost the poor must of
