burn slowly for several days, and the whole is thus turned into a black mass. This manure is only used for the seed. When the time for sowing arrives, one man makes the holes, another follows and puts the seeds in, a third adds the black substance, and the young seed planted in this manner develops itself with such force that it is enabled to drive its roots through the firm soil and take up the elements it requires. The Chinese farmer sows the wheat in seed-beds; after it has been well soaked in suds from manure, very close, and transplants them afterwards to the fields.
