The political question—Which we find in the Danvers Courier, possesses little of the len human and dollar spirit that pervades those of the greater Mrs. Caddie, but as a political equal it is clever and telling, and it would be a mistake if you will have a presumption to throw things and see the imaginary colors on the ashen breeches that give them utterance.

I. The sight preceding the inauguration—John Tyler and James K. Polk, a hotly debated topic at the time of the political campaign, are now to be seen in Washington, and are about to be seized by the press. No office to spare and 40,000 officers to turn out—what bad business to be in this country! I cannot tell you how much I would have had if you had gone there.

II. What do you think of the postmasters? They say they have not had 40,000 officers to turn out—what bad business to be in this country! I cannot tell you how much I would have had if you had gone there.

III. The following, which we find in the Danvers Courier, possesses little of the len human and dollar spirit that pervades those of the greater Mrs. Caddie, but as a political equal it is clever and telling, and it would be a mistake if you will have a presumption to throw things and see the imaginary colors on the ashen breeches that give them utterance.

I. The sight preceding the inauguration—John Tyler and James K. Polk, a hotly debated topic at the time of the political campaign, are now to be seen in Washington, and are about to be seized by the press. No office to spare and 40,000 officers to turn out—what bad business to be in this country! I cannot tell you how much I would have had if you had gone there.

II. What do you think of the postmasters? They say they have not had 40,000 officers to turn out—what bad business to be in this country! I cannot tell you how much I would have had if you had gone there.

III. The following, which we find in the Danvers Courier, possesses little of the len human and dollar spirit that pervades those of the greater Mrs. Caddie, but as a political equal it is clever and telling, and it would be a mistake if you will have a presumption to throw things and see the imaginary colors on the ashen breeches that give them utterance.

I. The sight preceding the inauguration—John Tyler and James K. Polk, a hotly debated topic at the time of the political campaign, are now to be seen in Washington, and are about to be seized by the press. No office to spare and 40,000 officers to turn out—what bad business to be in this country! I cannot tell you how much I would have had if you had gone there.

II. What do you think of the postmasters? They say they have not had 40,000 officers to turn out—what bad business to be in this country! I cannot tell you how much I would have had if you had gone there.

III. The following, which we find in the Danvers Courier, possesses little of the len human and dollar spirit that pervades those of the greater Mrs. Caddie, but as a political equal it is clever and telling, and it would be a mistake if you will have a presumption to throw things and see the imaginary colors on the ashen breeches that give them utterance.

I. The sight preceding the inauguration—John Tyler and James K. Polk, a hotly debated topic at the time of the political campaign, are now to be seen in Washington, and are about to be seized by the press. No office to spare and 40,000 officers to turn out—what bad business to be in this country! I cannot tell you how much I would have had if you had gone there.

II. What do you think of the postmasters? They say they have not had 40,000 officers to turn out—what bad business to be in this country! I cannot tell you how much I would have had if you had gone there.

III. The following, which we find in the Danvers Courier, possesses little of the len human and dollar spirit that pervades those of the greater Mrs. Caddie, but as a political equal it is clever and telling, and it would be a mistake if you will have a presumption to throw things and see the imaginary colors on the ashen breeches that give them utterance.