The Transatlantic Submarine Telegraph

Lieut. Maury, a gentleman of ... ity in the department ... he has devoted himself to ... respect, has satisfied himself ... bility of establishing ... ic communication between America and Europe, by the way of Newfoundland and Ireland, and has addressed a letter upon the subject to the Secretary of the Navy, setting forth the grounds on which he says that from Newfoundland to Ireland the distance 1600 miles, and throughout the whole way the bottom of the ocean is to be a plateau which has been placed there for the special purpose of holding the wires of a submarine telegraph — so deep as to be beyond the reach of ice, storms and debris, and so shallow that the wires may be readily lodged upon the bottom. The depth of the plateau is from 1500 to 2000 fathoms. There are no perceptible currents or moving agents at work, ... of the sea are as complete as they are at the bottom of a mill pond. This is known by the fact that the soundings which have been made there show a ground of microscopic shells, among which not a particle of sand or gravel exists. If there had been currents at the bottom these shells would have been abraded and mingled with sand and gravel; and the fact that they are not so, shows that the depths are not disturbed either by winds or currents. Consequently a telegraphic wire once lodged there would remain as completely beyond the reach of the accident of shipwreck as if it were buried in air tight cases. Therefore on the bottom of the deep reach between Newfoundland or the Cape on the north-east point of the coast of Belle Isle, (which is nearer to Ireland than Newfoundland,) and Ireland, are concerned, the practicability of the submarine telegraph across the Atlantic is proved. Lieut. Maury suggests that for the purpose of hastening the completion of a line which would be of almost incalculable advantage to our country, government could offer the expediency of offering a national prize to the Company through whose telegraphic wire the first message shall be passed across the Atlantic.

There is now a company ... the construction of a line ... New York to Newfoundland ... of the work is already ... contemplated ... charter from Newfoundland ... their line to Ireland ... to be hoped that ... Maury will have the ... prize to a ... company.
