LADIES' DEPARTMENT.

Edited by Mrs. M. J. Bailey.

Friday Evening, June 2, 1854.

Sewing Societies.

We have often wondered why sewing societies are not formed in this country, and on making this remark some time since to a lady, she replied: "The ladies are not well enough united in their views of the advantages of such societies, and the most important use to which a fund could be appropriated." It seems to us as worthy of remark that in Oregon we have no poor—no mendicants—no paupers! But still, occasions do sometimes occur when, if a fund was on hand to relieve distress, occasioned by fire, sickness or crime, by which families are left unprovided with necessary sustenance, it would afford great and immediate relief to the suffering, and satisfaction to the benevolent. There are also other important uses to which such a revenue could be applied: (For instance—a more praise-worthy design could not be sought than for the ladies of Salem to aid the Rev. Mr. Dickinson in erecting a church for public worship. We have attended his service on the Sabbath when the little school-room where he now officiates, was so crowded and destitute of seats that most of the members of the choir were compelled to stand, or sit about, some on the windows, stools, writing desks, or upon their song books upon the floor.—There might also be some improvements made in the Methodist church at Salem, to render it more comfortable and elegant in its internal arrangement. There needs a light suspended in the vestibule, for at present 'tis very dreary to leave the lighted church and be groping about in the dark for the door, or for a friend to lead you to it. There should be some kind of railing, (iron would be preferable) upon the sides of the steps, to prevent accidents. A green cloth upon the Sacramental table would be much more befitting than the one now in use; it would correspond better with the curtains, which by the way, ought to descend to the floor. The cushion on the pulpit stand should be covered with green velvet, to correspond with the table and curtains. And why can not the ladies bear all this expense! Have they no disposition to "beautify the house of our God," or to realize the truth of the proverb, that "benevolence is its own reward." More

To Correspondents.

"Tillo."—Very nearly right.

"Hezekiah."—We think we have heard something of that kind before. We hope you'll never be one of those unfortunates.

A new Acquaintance.

A few days since we received a call from a lady of rather singular appearance and genius, who thus accosted us:

"Madam, are you the editor of the Spectator?"

"Not at all Ma'am, we only have charge of the Ladies' Department in that paper."

"Well, that will do. I only wanted to know if you have the privilege of using what other women write, for I often wish I could talk right out in some newspaper, and have all the world hear me; and now tell me, Madam, will you print some things for me that I will tell you when I have an opportunity, and that I wish to have go abroad—I don't care how far, for I really think people might do better than they do. But how are they to know that they do wrong if never told so, for you know they cannot see their own faults."

We replied that we were quite willing to hear her complaints, and as far as they could with propriety be admitted into the paper, with any hope of success, we should be very happy to accomodate her.

By what name will we call you? said we, as the Editor will want to know who you are.

"O that is little matter anyhow," she replied, "but he and you can call me A——; that is what every body calls me, and I do not suppose they know if I have any other name."

"Well, A——, what do you wish to complain about?"

"Oh, a great many things, but I will not hinder you long this time, and you tell Mr. Editor, I'm going to write for the Spectator, and he need not say no, for I shall have your leave,"

"Well, but what are the faults?" we inquired.

"Sure enough, but I cannot stop to relate many this time. I was thinking this morning how vexatious it was, when I walk out, with one of my long dresses on, to find the side-walks nearly covered with tobacco-spits, from loafers sitting about on boxes, and to be obliged to pick my steps on tip-toe, as if I were walking on stepping-stones; and then to be so much afraid that my fine dress had got soiled, that I could take no pride in it afterwards."

"Any thing else?"

"Yes, and to go into a store, and while you are trading, to have men standing and sitting about, listening to every word you say and winking at each other, if you only try to beat the trader down a picayune on a skein of silk!"

"Any more?"

"Yes, a great deal more, but I see you are in a hurry; I'll go now, only you tell those dry-goods dealers, not to let the men spit all over their floors and on the sides of their counters, for if they do they will get little of my custom."

So saying, she went away as she came—in a hurry. We expect to hear from her again.

Apology.

We have the permission of the Editor of the Spectator, to say, that the remarks of "Mrs. Swisshelm on Dancing," and the anecdotes following the story of "Horace Penley, published last week in this department, were of his selection and not ours.

Serenades.

On Friday night last we shared in the pleasure of listening to a sweet serenade, given in compliment to a pretty young Miss, a member of the household. Feelings of sympathy vibrated within our own mind, as a fine voice sang:—

"O! Ladies, how my heart grows weary;
Far from the old folks at home."

We hope that next time they will not so soon "grow weary" of displaying their musical attainments.

When the harmony of voice, guitar, violin and trombone had ceased, a sweet bird, lodged in the bluff, commenced his carol, seemingly to try if he could not excel the first songsters. This latter serenade we selfishly considered in compliment to ourself, as we fancied he sang:

Poor heart-broken stranger,
There's music for thee;
Despair not—but list to my song—
Thou shalt see
In my cosy little nest
I truly am blest,
With my charmer and nestlings up here;
I am hid from your sight,
But all the long night
I sing to my loved ones ever dear.
Despair not dear stranger, the end is not yet,
The starlight now gleaming, in sunshine will set.

Errata.

In last week's issue, (26th ult.) in the article entitled "Horace Penley," commencing at the sixth paragraph, read: "Twas midnight e'er she arose from the place where she had sat with her head resting upon her hands, and these upon her bible,——&c.

Passage across Little Rock.

"Where art thou glorious stranger? thou!
So loved, so lost, where art thou now?
Foe—Gheber—infidel—whate'er
Th' unhallowed name thou'rt doomed to bear
Still glorious—still to this fond heart
Dear as its blood, whate'er thou art!
Yes—Alla, dreadful Alla! yes—
If there be wrong, be crime in this,
Let the black waves that round us roll,
Whelm me thou instant, ere my soul,
Forgetting faith—home—father—all—
Before its earthly idol fall,
Nor worship e'en Thyself above him—
For, oh! so wildly do I love him,
Thy Paradise itself were dim
And joyless, if not shared with him."

Fashions.

As intimated last week, the fashions are various. There is a great profusion of laces, fringes, flounces, feathers, artificials, &c. apparent in the present style of dress, as found in Godey's Lady's Book, and Graham's Magazine. Skirts plain flounced or trimmed with folds are equally fashionable. Mantillas are much worn, and bonnets are made small.

HORACE PENLEY.

BY RUTH ROVER.

Horace commenced his toilet saying, "O, fie, fie, what nonsense it is to love. Abandon fine dazzling, attainable hopes for love—for, for A——" and he raised the water to his face, "for A——but O, that loved one!"

He paused, and perceiving that his inmost thoughts would talk, he hurried on with his preparations for breakfast, trying to give a thought to nothing but to get out of the room as quickly as possible where there might be something before his eyes but the image of Amy. In his haste he washed his face without removing his night-cap, scoured his teeth in the wash-bowl, put the right boot upon the left foot, and vice-versa, tied his cravat over the collar of his night shirt, and was actually brushing his luxuriant hair with the clothes-brush, when he discovered his mistake.

"Well," said he, "I am crazy, or shall be if I don't get over this"; and away he went, and as soon as might be he enlisted his thoughts in a case which required his attention in the court-house.

At odd times, afterwards, he would soliloquize on the same subject, but generally expressed himself thus. "Love! yes, I will love! what is life worth without love? I am not a mere automaton; I will love because I can't help it. But I will love a woman who is worthy of me; she shall be a beauty and a gentleman's daughter, and possessed of every grace; in short, a lady, just what the wife of Horace Penley ought to be, and I'll keep her like a lady; an ornament of my parlor and a charmer for myself."

Horace and Amy met no more face to face. In a few months he was elected to Congress, and was on his way to Washington, anticipating with great delight the realization of his glowing dreams. And they were realized to the fullest extent he could desire. He conducted the business of his country's call with honor to himself and satisfaction to his constituents. His company was eagerly sought by the intelligent and refined. He met and married his beautiful wife in less than two months from his arrival in Washington, received a fortune with her, and, to the fullest extent, the glowing anticipations of his fancy were gratified.

When on his return from Congress, the remembrance of Amy sometimes crossed his thoughts. He felt a degree of regret lest his great good luck should occasion pain and mortification to her mind, and would rather have settled himself in any other neighborhood than in that where she resided; but this regret was lessened when he learned that she—having heard of his marriage—had consented to wed a gentleman who was every way worthy of her, and was living, apparently in great contentment, with her husband.

Five years from this latter date she was sitting, one evening, on the sofa with him alone. His arm was around her waist; his right hand held hers, while he was gazing upon her face with great apparent satisfaction. Amy was equally happy as himself, with the exception of the pain she felt on having learned that Horace was not as fortunate in his marriage relations as herself.

Henry Dean was wealthy, exceedingly wealthy. His industrious habits for the last six years of his life, together with the approbation of the public, which he had deservedly obtained by an unflinching course of honesty and uprightness in his dealings, and with the blessing of having a wife who lent all the energies of her mind to encourage and uphold him, had secured this to him. In their parlor was every luxury and comfort which could be desired. Every article of furniture or ornament which Henry brought to his house was given to his wife with the command accompanying it, "Now Amy, my dear, enjoy that to the utmost."

Amy had not been backward to improve the appearance of the place as far as was in her power. She had embroidered covers for the fire-stools, the sofa pillows, the centre table and piano stool, and had ornamented the walls of the room also with pictures, mostly of her own designs, wrought with flies on perforated paper. In one place was the sacramental cup, with the words "Drink ye all of it." In another was the "All-seeing Eye." In another was seen upon a rich stand, "My bible," and in another still was a representation of a neat white cottage, with its ivy-bound portices and shrubs and flowers, and birds, with the words, "Ida's Sweet Home" wrought beneath it.

"Amy, my dear," said Henry, "do you remember what you promised me on our wedding night that I might call you in five years from that time, if we should both live, and I should consider you worthy of that appellation? It is now five years since we were married, and are you going to keep your purpose and permit me to call you my treasure, as I then commenced to do, but was forbidden, as you said I did not know if you would prove such to me?"

"I remember it all, but am not assured that you consider me worthy," she replied, as she looked into his face with a smile which seemed to say, you know better; you know I do believe you think me worthy.

"O, my dear wife," said he clasping her to his bosom, "my love, my life, my treasure! yes, I could not, would not live without you!" and sweet was the communion of hearts that existed there where each was content with the other; where neither sought the honors of the world in preference to domestic felicity; where mind was equal to mind; where bliss was sought and found in living for each other, and where the harmony of two turtle doves was never greater than that which existed between Henry and Amy Dean.

The most gloomy part of the story remains to be told; and next week we will continue and conclude the present history of Horace Penley.

☞ Mankind are always happier for having been happy; so that if you make them happy now, you make them happy twenty years hence, by the memory of it. A childhood passed with a due mixture of rational indulgence, under fond and wise parents, diffuses over the whole of life a feeling of calm pleasure, and in extreme old age is the very last remembrance which time can erase from the mind of man. How enjoyment, however inconsiderable, is confined to the present moment! A man is the happier for life from having made once an agreeable tour, or lived for any length of time with pleasant people, or enjoyed any considerable interval of innocent pleasure.

☞ Brougham mentioned that on the Princess of Wales coming over to England, it was matter of discussion among a party what one word of English her Royal Highness (who was totally ignorant of the language) should be first taught to speak. The whole company agreed that "yes" was the most useful word, except Lady Charlotte Lindsay, who suggested that "no" was twice as useful, as it so often stood for "yes."

☞ To constitute a perfect gentleman, the best attributes of the heart and head must be combined. He who would indeed deserve that proud epithet, must be devout, courteous, and accomplished, gentle, generous, and brave; pure in word and deed, disinterested, philanthropic, and, above all, incessant and intrepid in charitably succoring the weak, the lowly, and the poor.

☞ In making once made up your mind as to a course of duty, let nothing turn you from that purpose if you be satisfied that it is right and honorable.

☞ Objects are but bright and happy as the eyes of the mind see them; with a vision clouded or unclouded by its secret shadow.

☞ The good things which belong to prosperity are to be wished, but the good things that belong to adversity are to be admired.

☞ Solitude is the nurse of all that is good within us. The world strains what it touches, and the more we withdraw from it the better we are.

☞ It is said of the celebrated writer, Bayle, that when his mother desired to receive his portrait, he sent her a picture of his heart.

☞ There is no policy like politeness; and a good manner is the best thing in the world either to get a good name, or to supply the want of it.

☞ Flowers are one of the many beautiful gifts of God to man.

☞ Afflictions are sent us by Providence to teach us how to live and pray.

Wife Wanted.

A GENTLEMAN of respectable standing, desirous of obtaining a partner to share with him life's joys and sorrows, takes this method of making known his own qualifications, as well as those he would wish her to possess. To please, she must not be under 18, nor over 21 years of age, of medium size, with dark blue eyes and dark brown hair; must be a slave to no bad habits, and in the enjoyment of good health; must understand washing, ironing, cooking and sewing, and the general routine of household duties. A knowledge of music would be desired, yet—if possessing the other qualities—the taste for, and ability to acquire that, would be sufficient. She must be intelligent, prudent, amiable and kind, and have a mind to appreciate and a heart to love one who can truly love her in return; must be at home, as well in the parlor as in the kitchen, and in every way qualified for the duties and responsibilities of a wife.

Such an one will find in the advertiser one who has a heart to love, and a disposition to please; one who is temperate, industrious and economical; one who despises the hypocrite, and respects and loves the moral and the good—whether rich or poor—wherever they may be found; one who is cheerful, contented and happy, and possessed of good health, good sense, and a fair share of this world's goods, and though not handsome, would not object to any young lady on that account; one who respects the rights of woman, but will not allow her to infringe on his; one who has the disposition and independence to do what is right, as well as the firmness to shun what is wrong, and one who believes in the existence of a God, and in the truth of the Bible.

Any lady, possessing the requisite qualifications, desirous of forming an acquaintance with the advertiser, will please address, "ISAAC N. OSBURN, Butteville, Marion county, Oregon," stating true name, residence, &c. May 2, 1854-3w[illegible]

SURVEYOR GENERAL'S NOTICE TO SETTLERS.

In pursuance of Instructions from the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

To enable the Surveyor General to separate the private Land claims from the public domain, and to determine the quantity and boundaries of the fractions of land remaining unclaimed in the several Townships heretofore surveyed and approved—and in order that subsequent settlers may enter upon and protect titles to the same, under the Act of September 27, 1850: All settlers who have not taken their claims by legal subdivisions, in such Townships, and have already made their notifications, are required to have their claims surveyed by the authority of this office, within four months from the date of this notice: and all settlers who have taken their claims on unsurveyed lands, and shall hereafter file their notifications for claims not conforming to legal subdivisions, are also required to have the claims surveyed, by the authority of this office, within four months from the dates of their notifications, respectively.

A legal effort to comply with the above requirements, will be at the peril of the claimant, as settlers will be permitted to enter upon and file notifications for legal subdivisions, which would have to be made fractional by the claims aforesaid.

A written request to the Surveyor General for a survey will be considered sufficient.
