The World publishes the names of 71 While we doubt the propriety of the set that thus lays bare the hidden life of golden memories, we deeply sympathize with the struggling woman who, in even greater, and the names of 127 inspite of disappointment and crosses and describon, still stands by her maternal duties and grapples hard with destiny in support of her children, while the unnatural father leaves then it to perish.

Mrs. Miller's poem seems to us the wall of a broken heart.

Wearity waiteth to die.
God and the angels may tell us
What beaptiful faith we have wrough!,
When we stand there together
And a crown or two he brought.
But what are crowns to the love
That spoke in sighs that June,
When you brought your flute and played
The sweetest of all love's tungs?

So the old colonel warily worked his way up the hill, lay agist shat nignt, and the next day found his way back to Gettysburg, rejoined his overjoyed regiment, and regained his overjoyed regiment, hold up! how my pen runs off with me! I can't help it however; that's just the way old Father Wheelock would run off with everybody when he sat down to tell a story.

Let me see! I was to give an account, I believe of his auction.

"There was," said he, "a poor fellow from Auburn among the drafted men who were sent me in the Fall of less. I pitied-him. for he had left a large destitute family. He fell sick, and went to hospital, quite as much, I think, from home-sickness as disease. About the holidays he died; and soon after I received a Christmas box for him. Now then I'll tell you how I got rid of it last week.

then I'il tell you how I got rid of it last week.

"Just after dress-parade I mounted a stump and shouted to the boys that I had something to tell them. They came running together; and when there was a crowd, says I, "I'll drop the dignity of Colonel for half as hour and turn anctioneer." I then told them about the box, and read the letter which came with it. It was a most touching one, telling of their struggles and of the love which had sent him a little Christmas loken from home. 'Boys,' said I, 'we do not know how soon our families may be just there. This seems a true, good woman. I propose we do a little something to comfort her under the heavy news I must write. This box contains a small fruit-cake, a pair of suspenders, a skein of thresd, and a few needles. A comrade of his company offers to give me $5 for the box to help the family, but I think we can do better."

"It then cut the cake into forty slices, about a mouthful apiece, and putting one into my pocket said, 'These are fifty cents apiece, but I will go double. Now, who bids?"

"The Adjutant kept count and took the money, and in five minutes all was gone.

the money, and in five minutes all was gone.

"The suspenders were then brought out, and run up by fifty cents at a time to $5, at which price they were knocked down and paid for. 'Put 'em up again,' Colonel, said the man; and this time they were struck off at $7; and so twice more till they brought us $19. The skein of thread was divided up and realized $3.

"Seeing the men were doing everything while the officers looked thoughtlessly on, and enjoyed it, I took one of the needles, and said: These are a dollar apiece.' I then handed it to Capt. A., saying: 'Young man, I'll make you a present of that.' No you don't, Colonel,' he replied; 'I haven't the money by me, but I'll get it when I go to my tent.' The officers took the hint, and the needles were cleaned out at the lasse figure.

and the needles were created in the inner figure.

"So the poor fellow's box, not worth more than a dollar, brought $70.50, to which I added a triffe of my own, and sent her a check for $100, hoping it might meet her wants in her time of might meet her wants in her time of need.

"Yesterday I got a letter from the wife;" and with that he handed it to Major N. and myself. It conveyed her thanks and blessing, and was—but I won't try to say—only I don't wonder the Colonel's eyes were suspictously res, and his voice trembled a little as he left the tent, saying, "Chaplain, you'll be sure to give me the next job you have in the auction line."—Christian Union.
