A Question of Revenue

The question as to the relative merits of the McKinley and Wilson-Gorman tariff acts, in the matter of raising the necessary revenues, is still troubling the minds of democratic senators and repreduring the month of June will have a July, 1897, and then publicly opened, for estatives in congress. It has long been established by the reports of the treasury department that the McKinley act raised sufficient revenues to carry on the government so long as it was assured that the law would be uphoid but when the result of the elections of 1892 were W. L. known and the assurance was given to the world that the free traders had captured the government in all its branches, and that the first work they would perform would be to wipe the reputlican protective tariff law from off the statute books, then that law failed to raise the necessary revenue.
