

The Need of a Sense of Humor.

The daily reports of suicides, divorces, ruined lives and the like strongly suggest that we Americans are morbidly inclined to "take things too seriously."

Yesterday, for example, was recorded the suicide of a woman who habitually made herself unhappy over trifles, who on one occasion "moped for days" over a question of grammar in which she had been found to be wrong. At last she killed herself because her husband, a printer, was too sleepy to talk to her when he came home from his work at 2 p. m.

Another case was recently reported in which a woman killed herself because some dish that she had set out to make had proved a failure. Another in which a man committed suicide because his income was slightly reduced. Another in which a bright boy, owing to illness, failed to pass a school examination and because of his parent's censure hanged himself.

Isn't it time for our schools to cultivate in our children a sense of humor? Isn't it time for them to teach the philosophy of hopefulness. Many a man has confronted despair at night only to find success awaiting him the morning.

Despair is always morbid. Hopefulness is always strong. It is impossible for circumstances to defeat a capable person who faces conditions courageously. The little things of life are really very little. The great thing is courage, and it is all-conquering.

When Drury Lane theater was burning, Sheridan who had his all invested in it, was found at a coffee house opposite sipping a glass of sherry, and when somebody remarked that he was singularly placid under the circumstances he replied, "Why shouldn't a man be placid when he is having a glass of wine at his own fireside?" If Sheridan's sense of humor had been less he would have jumped into the Thames that awful night.
